Kim Davenport: We found this new resource through the National Association for the Education of Young Children (NAEYC) and their Asian Interest Forum. A professor at California State University - Fullerton created the story with support from colleagues. It is a free resource for families. Even more powerful is how quickly the group was able to get it translated into so many languages. There is also an audio version posted. The link below will get you to website where the story and translations are posted. It was designed to be written through a trauma-informed lens. Dr. Shu-Chu has done this for other large-scale impact events, like 9/11. Link to page with all translated versions, with more noted to be coming soon. https://sandybabaece.wixsite.com/covid19referencelist

JADONNIA BISHOP: resources such as at hgtv.com offers crafts projects as helpful to parents. Learning activities don't have to be specifically 'academic'. Having families engaging in quality time also helps bonding and learning happens there too
