BACK PAGE
Greetings! It gives me great pleasure to kick off my tenure as Chair of the NACC Board of Directors. I follow in a line of terrific Chairs and I particularly want to thank immediate past Chair, Candace Barr of Minneapolis, Minnesota, for her wonderful work and hospitality for the past two years. I look forward to continuing to work with her and all of our board members.

I am one of the lucky few lawyers of my generation who was able to begin learning about children's issues in law school. As a student at the University of Michigan in the early 1980’s I was desperate for an escape from traditional law school classes after the first year and found the Child Advocacy Law Clinic and Professor Don Duquette (we’ve stayed connected — Don is the NACC’s current Board Treasurer). During law school I also worked as a law clerk at the National Center for Youth Law in San Francisco.

After a short detour into civil litigation (there was no clear career path in child advocacy at the time), I was fortunate to land an attorney position at Legal Services for Children in San Francisco, one of the only law offices in the country providing comprehensive direct representation for children. I stayed for ten years, serving as Managing Attorney and Director along the way.

For the last ten years I have been at the California Administrative Office of the Courts (AOC), working exclusively on family and children’s issues. Several years ago, the AOC brought together all of its projects dealing with families and children and created the Center for Families, Children & the Courts, a unique entity within American court administration, providing statewide leadership and assistance to the judicial branch on family and children’s issues.

One of my cases at the University of Michigan clinic helped to develop my view of the proper role of a child’s attorney. We represented Crystal, an 11-year old who had been placed with her grandparents for a number of years. Her case was up for a routine review hearing and the social work report showed no significant changes. In interviewing Crystal before the hearing she told us that her grandparents had used corporal punishment and had wrongfully accused her of stealing from them and locked her in her room. She wanted us to inform the court but did not want us to discuss these allegations with her grandparents.

My partner and I frankly weren’t convinced that Crystal was being totally truthful with us and we feared the repercussions of raising these issues because she had been with her grandparents for a long time and didn’t have any other relatives available to take her in.

We finally decided to inform the court of what Crystal had told us and let the chips fall where they may. Crystal wanted us to speak in court for her and we told the court what she had told us in front of our client and her grandparents. The judge listened carefully and asked the grandparents to respond. They denied using corporal punishment or locking her in her room but admitted that they had recently punished her for stealing.

The judge spoke directly to Crystal and said that he had heard her concerns but thought that continuing to stay with her grandparents was clearly the best thing for her. He told her to make sure to let us, her attorneys, know if there were any other incidents such as we had described. He also made sure that the grandparents agreed to let her contact us whenever she wanted.

After the hearing we talked to Crystal, both alone and with her grandparents. We gave her our card again and made sure she knew how to contact us. The grandparents looked appropriately weary but didn’t seem angry about how the hearing unfolded. Crystal seemed much happier now and wasn’t frightened about going home with her grandparents. She had her “day in court.” Although this was a long term case, the review hearing was our first appearance as Crystal’s student attorneys, since the clinic was only a one semester course. I got the feeling that they’d all (including the judge) been through this sort of thing before. The family went off together and when we called Crystal a couple of months later to check in on her, she said everything was fine.

The case taught me the fundamental meaning of establishing a confidential relationship with a client and keeping your word. If we had told the court our personal belief that Crystal might be exaggerating or had we played judge and stayed silent about her allegations, the end result in court might have been the same, but she would probably never trust us again and would never have seen that we had a different role than other people in her life.

This experience was the first of many I have had as an attorney for children that lead me to believe strongly in the client-directed approach to representation embodied in the ABA and NACC standards of practice for children’s attorneys. The point of having a confidential relationship with a client is to build a relationship of confidence so that there is at least one person the client can trust to be on his or her side. Protecting that confidential relationship for clients whose trust has often been betrayed time and time again may, in the long run, be “in the best interests of the child.”

This is an exciting time to be a member of the NACC with so much happening, including the certification of attorneys as specialists in child welfare law and the new children’s law office project which is helping to build dedicated specialized model children’s law offices.
Neither the Attorney Certification Project nor the Children’s Law Office Project would have been feasible for this young profession just a few years ago. It is a sign of the maturing professional practice of children’s law that the attorneys and organizations that have done the work for many years can begin to be recognized alongside those in the “mainstream” legal specialties. The NACC has led the way in helping the profession to reach this point of development.

The two major ambitions I have for the NACC as your new Board Chair are to increase the membership base and to develop more state and local affiliates. NACC membership is currently at or near an all-time high. Yet, to be representative of the lawyers engaged in children’s law nationwide we need more members from more jurisdictions. The NACC could be a much stronger force in many regions in the country. So tell your friends about the NACC and sign them up. The NACC will even give you a bonus for referring new members.

In addition to my role as national Board Chair, I am proud to be the President of the Northern California Association of Counsel for Children (NCACC), the NACC affiliate in the San Francisco Bay Area. We are one of the two active NACC affiliates in California. Thanks to a core of dedicated and extraordinary members, the NCACC conducts regular training events and has active amicus curiae and legislative committees. These activities mirror the major functions of the NACC on the national level.

Affiliates do not have to conduct all of the same activities. They can largely choose their own course within the broad mission of the NACC. The important thing is to get colleagues together, form the group, start to meet regularly, and set an agenda. The NACC stands ready to help. And once a group’s charter is approved, and it officially becomes an NACC affiliate, part of the NACC’s annual dues from members within the region can be forwarded to the affiliate to help support it.

The NACC has a great staff in Denver with an inspirational and dedicated CEO whom I have immensely enjoyed working with over the years and look forward to working even more closely with as Board Chair.

I look forward to the next two years. Please feel free to contact me with questions or comments about the NACC any time. My direct line and email address are 415-865-7721 and christopher.wu@jud.ca.gov.

I hope to see you in Hollywood this August at the annual conference.

Shannan was the 2004 recipient of the NACC Outstanding Legal Advocacy Award.
Dependency / Children’s Right to Representation

The case involves a class action brought on behalf of foster children in DeKalb and Fulton Counties (counties) for the counties failure to provide adequate and effective legal representation to children in their care. The Federal District Court issued an order denying the defendants’ motions for summary judgment. In its opinion, the court stated that foster children have both a statutory and constitutional right to representation.

In both counties child advocate attorneys are appointed to represent children in deprivation and termination of parental rights hearings. Together the counties have over 2000 children in foster care and they employ a combined total of nine child advocates. The plaintiffs contend that they have a right to legal counsel and that high caseloads make effective representation impossible. NACC CEO Marvin Ventrell provided expert testimony on standards of practice in child welfare cases based on the NACC Recommendations and Standards of Practice for the Legal Representation of Children in Abuse and Neglect Cases. His testimony was accepted by the court and cited in its opinion. The court concluded that both the Georgia Constitution and State statute provide a right to counsel for children in deprivation and termination of parental rights cases.

Dependency / Domestic Violence

This §1983 action was brought by Nicholson against the New York City Administration for Children’s Services (ACS) on behalf of mothers and children that were separated because their mothers were victims of domestic violence. Plaintiffs alleged that ACS, as a matter of policy, removed children from mothers who were victims of domestic violence, because as victims they were engaged in domestic violence. The plaintiffs argued that as a result of this practice, ACS removed and detained children without probable cause or due process of law. The District Court ruled that ACS policies violated both substantive due process and procedural due process. ACS appealed the decision to the Second Circuit, which held that the District Court had not abused its discretion.

In January 2002, the District Court granted a preliminary injunction, concluding that the City may not penalize a battered mother, who is not otherwise unfit, by separating her from her children. Furthermore, the court found that children may not be separated from their mother solely because of domestic violence because it punishes them for the batterer’s actions. The Court found that ACS unnecessarily, routinely charged mothers with neglect and removed their children when the mothers had been victims of domestic violence. The District Court found, therefore, that ACS practices and policies violated the rights of mothers and children not to be separated by the government without due process unless the parent is unfit to care for the child.

On appeal, the Second Circuit held that the District Court had not abused its discretion. The Second Circuit concluded that the evidence supported the District Court’s finding that ACS had a practice of removing children based on the parent’s failure to prevent exposure to domestic violence against a parent, and that in some circumstances the removals may raise serious questions of federal constitutional law. To avoid unnecessary constitutional adjudication the Second Circuit, by three certified questions, put the open state statutory law issues to the Court of Appeals for resolution.

First, the Court considered whether a parent could be found responsible for neglect based on evidence that the parent was a victim of domestic violence and that the child had been exposed to domestic violence. The Court concluded that exposure to domestic violence alone did not establish neglect. To establish neglect New York law requires proof of actual (or imminent danger of) physical, emotional or mental impairment to the child, and there must be a connection between the basis for the neglect petition and the child’s impairment.

The Court next considered whether exposure to domestic violence can rise to a level that establishes an imminent danger or risk to a child’s life or health, making removal appropriate. The Court stated that removal based on domestic violence is appropriate under four circumstances: 1) temporary removal with consent; 2) preliminary orders after a petition is filed; 3) preliminary orders before a petition is filed; and 4) emergency removal without a court order. The Court held that emergency removal is appropriate only when a child is in imminent danger and his or her life or safety will be at risk before an ex parte order can be obtained.

The third question invoked process. The Court considered whether the fact that the child witnessed abuse demonstrates that removal is appropriate based on exposure.
to domestic violence. The Court stated that there can be no blanket presumption favoring removal of a child witness to domestic violence, and that each case is fact specific.

Therefore the Court ruled that it is not constitutional to remove a child solely because the child witnessed a parent or caretaker as a victim of domestic violence. The court also held that there can never be a presumption to remove a child because of domestic violence. In December 2004, New York City settled this class action and reformed the way it handled cases involving domestic violence exposure.

Criminal / Child Victim’s Right to Representative

The Arizona Court of Appeals considered whether a representative, other than a legal guardian, may be appointed for a minor when the defendant is not part of the victim’s “immediate family.” The Court held that Arizona’s Victims’ Bill of Rights requires the appointment of a separate representative when the minor’s legal guardian is unable or unwilling to adequately represent the minor victim’s interest.

The defendant was charged with six counts of child molestation, class 2 felonies, and dangerous crimes against children. The victims are two children that are cousins aged four and eight. The victims lived in the same house as the defendant when the offenses took place and up until his arrest. The legal guardians live there as well. The four-year old victim's legal guardian is both victims' grandmother and the defendant's sister. The eight-year old victim's mother is both guardian and the defendant's niece. Both legal guardians admitted that the victims had informed them of the alleged molestation.

The State filed a petition requesting that independent representatives be appointed for the victims other than their legal guardians. The State argued that the legal guardians were not accurately expressing the views of the victims and they were trying to protect the defendant. The trial court denied the State’s request to appoint representatives for the victims. The trial court concluded that the law did not authorize it to appoint a representative because although the defendant lived in the same home as the victims, he was not part of the victim’s immediate family. The state appealed the trial court decision.

After the appeal, the defendant pled guilty to two counts of child molestation, class 3 felonies. The legal guardians claimed that the case was moot since the need to cooperate with the prosecution no longer existed and because the victims did not need to participate in the sentencing hearings.

The Court of Appeals first considered whether the issue was moot. Pursuant to the Arizona constitution, any victim has the right to be heard at any proceeding involving a post-arrest release, a negotiated plea, or sentencing. The victim's right to be heard is also asserted in the Arizona Rule of Criminal Procedure and by the Arizona Legislature. Additionally, the court is mandated to consider the

The Tenth Annual Rocky Mountain Child Advocacy Training Institute 2005

A Premier Skills Training Program for Lawyers Who Represent the Interests of Children

May 16–20, 2005 NITA National Education Center • Louisville, Colorado

The Rocky Mountain Child Advocacy Training Institute is a unique hands-on, learning-by-doing trial skills training. You will learn through lecture, demonstration, discussion, and participatory workshops. The combination of formats helps to ensure the most effective learning for each of the variety of trial skills presented over the course of five days. The majority of workshops place you in a simulated courtroom setting where you will perform as a trial lawyer. You will receive feedback from instructors with significant courtroom and teaching experiences. Expert regional and national teachers, judges and trial lawyers serve as faculty for this special advocacy training program.

Specific workshops include:

• Questioning techniques for direct and cross examination
• Case analysis and organization
• Examination of expert witnesses
• Evidentiary foundations – testimonial foundations for refreshing recollection & impeachment and foundations for exhibits and demonstrative aids
• Using exhibits in direct and cross examination
• How to control difficult witnesses
• Ethics and professionalism physical, emotional, and financial harm caused to the victim at sentencing.

The children's legal guardians did not believe that the children had been molested, and maintained that the defendant was innocent. Since there was an issue as to whether the present legal guardians would permit the victims to present the harm caused by the offenses, the Court concluded that the issue was not moot because the trial court must take into account the impact the crime had on the victims when sentencing.

The next issue was whether Arizona law provided the trial court with the authority to appoint a representative to the victims in this case. The statute provides that the victim's parent or other immediate family member may exercise all of the victim's rights on behalf of the victim. It further states that when a defendant is a member of the victim's immediate family a representative other than a parent or immediate family member may be appointed on behalf of the minor. Immediate family includes spouse, parent, child, sibling, grandparent or lawful guardian. Neither party contended that the defendant was an immediate family member to the victims.

The Court stated that no rule expressly gave the trial court authority to appoint a representative in a situation where the defendant does not meet the definition of “immediate family,” but that does not mean that the trial court lacks the authority to do so. The Court found that the rules and statutes that express the court’s authority to appoint guardians ad litem are not exclusive sources of power. The Court held, therefore, that the statute in question did not limit the court’s equitable power to appoint a representative to a minor victim in circumstances where the defendant does not meet the definition of “immediate family.” It reversed the trial court decision, and concluded that the ability to appoint representatives for minors is not just a power, but a right of the victim. Furthermore, the parties before the court have a right to insist that the court exercise this power on a minor victim’s behalf.

Thank you to NACC Iowa member Rita Swan of CHILD, Inc. for identifying this case.

Dependency / Best Interests Standard of Proof

This case determined the standard of proof during the best interests portion of a proceeding to terminate parental rights. The trial court terminated respondent mother’s parental rights based on its sound discretion, rather than a clear and convincing evidence standard. The Illinois Appellate Court reversed. It held that the State failed to demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that termination of parental rights was in the minor’s best interests. The Supreme Court of Illinois reversed the case to the trial court for a new best interests hearing to be conducted under a preponderance of the evidence standard.

Brenda T. took her four-year old son, D.T., to the emergency room because D.T. was in severe pain from an injury to his scrotum inflicted by respondent’s boyfriend. The injury was at least two days old. D.T. was transferred to Children's Memorial Hospital and had surgery to determine whether castration would be necessary. D.T. had additional injuries including multiple bruises on his face, arm, back, buttock, and thigh. He also had a bruise on his cheek that was consistent with an open hand slap.

After D.T. was discharged from the hospital, he was taken into protective custody. He was originally placed in a group home and then moved to a foster home. D.T. participated in therapy and performed well academically in his foster home, however he had social problems at school. D.T.’s foster mother expressed interest in adopting him.

The State filed a petition to terminate the parental rights of Brenda T. The trial court determined that the State had demonstrated by clear and convincing evidence that Brenda T. was unfit and that she had failed to protect D.T. A month later the best interests hearing took place. The trial court found within its sound discretion that it was in D.T.’s best interests to terminate respondent mother’s parental rights. The Appellate Court affirmed the finding of unfitness and held that a preponderance of the evidence standard applied at the best interests hearing and the State failed to satisfy that burden. The case was remanded for further proceedings.

Under the Juvenile Court Act of 1987 (JCA) the State must first establish by clear and convincing evidence that the parent is unfit, then the court determines whether it is in the child’s best interest to terminate parental rights. The JCA does not expressly state the standard for the best interests hearing although it does give some guidance. It provides that the standard of proof and rules of evidence in civil proceedings applies to the section titled Abused, Neglected, or Dependant Minors, which includes the section under which the termination was filed. The standard of proof in civil proceedings is either preponderance of the evidence or clear and convincing evidence. Therefore, the JCA suggests that one of these two standards will apply. The appellate court determined that a preponderance of the evidence standard is appropriate.

The State and the GAL argued that sound discretion allowed the court too much discretion. If courts applied sound discretion as a standard of proof, a judge would have the authority to reject evidence submitted by a party. Additionally, the judge’s ruling would be presumptively correct on review.

The Court found that although sound discretion is tied to a standard of review, it is not a standard of proof. A trial judge’s evidentiary rulings during a best interests hearing are subject to an abuse of discretion standard of review. The Court held that sound discretion does not define the State’s burden of proof at the best interests stage of a proceeding to terminate parental rights.

To decide whether the preponderance standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard applied the court looked at Santosky v. Kramer. The Court stated that parents are not entitled to the same standard of proof at the unfitness hearing as they are at the best-interests hearing. The clear and convincing evidence standard is appropriate at the unfitness hearing because the focus is on the private interests of the parents. However, in a best interests hearing the focus shifts to the child. There is no issue as to whether the parent’s rights can be terminated, only as to whether, in light of the child’s needs, the rights should be terminated.

The Court concluded that the trial court erred, and that remand was appropriate, but that the appellate court should not have conducted its own review of the evidence. Therefore, the Court remanded the case to the trial court for a new best interests hearing under a preponderance of the evidence standard.

Thank you to NACC Chicago member Rich Cozzola for identifying this case.

Delinquency / Strip Searches Violate Fourth Amendment

This case involves an appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Connecticut that after a bench trial dismissed a complaint alleging that the strip searches of two girls in a juvenile detention center violated the Fourth Amendment. The Court concluded that the searches upon each initial entry into the custody of the State’s juvenile facilities were lawful. However, additional searches conducted while the girls remained in custody violated the Fourth Amendment. The Court concluded that the searches upon initial entry into the custody of the State’s juvenile facilities were lawful. However, additional searches conducted while the girls remained in custody violated the Fourth Amendment in the absence of reasonable suspicion that contraband was possessed. The judgment was vacated and remanded as to damages.

Delinquency / Dark Poetry Not A Criminal Threat

In this case the Supreme Court of California considered whether a poem written by a high school student constituted a criminal threat. The Court concluded that the poem was ambiguous and in light of the circumstances surrounding its dissemination the poem was not a criminal threat. Therefore, it reversed the juvenile court and appellate court orders and overturned the juvenile’s conviction.

G.T., 15, had been at Santa Teresa High School for about two weeks when he gave three of his classmates a piece of paper labeled “dark poetry.” The poem stated in part “I am Dark, Destructive, & Dangerous. I slap on my face happiness but inside I am evil!! For I can be the next kid to bring guns to kill students at school. So parents watch your children cuz I’m BACK.” (16 Cal. 3rd at 63). Upon reading the poems, one of the students became frightened. She gave the poems back to G.T., and immediately left campus in fear. She emailed her English teacher to notify him of the poems. The matter was reported to the police and officers went to G.T.’s uncle’s house, where he and his father were living. When asked about the poem, he handed the officers a paper that contained a poem entitled “Faces in My Head.” This poem was labeled “dark poetry” but was never handed out at school. He was then taken into custody.

Police officers investigated at the school and interviewed the girls G.T. gave his poem. One of the girls reported that she felt threatened by the poem. The other girl stated that she had not actually read the poem, the police then gave her a copy to read and she became terrified and stated that she read the poem as a personal threat. The third girl stated that she did not think the poem was threatening and she later testified on G.T.’s behalf.

G.T. testified that the poem was not intended to be a threat because he believed that the girls were his friends. He stated that he thought of poetry as art and that it was the medium he used to describe his feelings. Furthermore, G.T. testified that he labeled the poems “dark poetry” to identify the type of expression the poems were. G.T.’s classmate testified that the poem made her feel sad and that G.T. seemed to be mild, calm, and very serene. The juvenile court adjudicated G.T. a ward to be mild, calm, and very serene. The court found that she read the poem as a personal threat; 3) that the threat was so unequivocal, unconditional, immediate, and specific as to convey to the person threatened, a gravity of purpose and immediate prospect of execution of the threat; 4) that the threat actually caused the person threatened to be in sustained fear for his or her own safety; and 5) that the threatened person’s fear was reasonable under the circumstances. (16 Cal. 3rd at 630).

The Court first considered the proper standard of review. Usually claims challenging the sufficiency of evidence are reviewed under the substantial evidence standard. Under this standard an appellate court reviews the entire record in the light most favorable to the prosecution to determine whether the record contains reasonable, credible evidence that the trier of fact could find the elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. G.T. contended that because the First Amendment was implicated the court should apply the independent review standard. The Court adopted G.T.’s reasoning. It therefore deferred to the juvenile court’s credibility determinations, but independently examined the record as a whole.

The Court found that the poem was not on its face and under the circumstances so unequivocal, unconditional, immediate and specific as to convey to (the girls) a gravity of purpose and an immediate prospect of execution of the threat. The Court concluded that while the poem may be discomforting, it did not constitute an actual threat to kill or cause great bodily harm. Since the Court concluded that the poem was not an unequivocal threat, it did not discuss G.T.’s specific intent. The Court reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeals and held that the dark poetry did not constitute a criminal threat.

Custody / Natural Mother Petitions for Custody

The Ohio Court of Appeals affirmed the juvenile court’s order that a natural parent who had lost her parental rights could petition the state as a legal stranger for custody of the child. P.F. is the natural mother of Salina M. who was born in 1990. In 1997, P.F. lost custody of Salina because of her repeated incarcerations and cocaine addiction. The court terminated P.F.’s parental rights and awarded custody of Salina to Hamilton County Jobs and Family Services (HCJFS) with the expectation that Salina would be adopted by her foster family.

Salina was not adopted by her foster family; instead she spent seven years in numerous foster homes and institutions. In 2003, P.F. learned that Salina did not have a permanent family environment and she petitioned the juvenile court for custody of her daughter. P.F. argued that Ohio law permits “any person” to seek custody of a child who is a ward of the state. She contended that she had the same right as any other non-parent to seek custody of Salina and to demonstrate to the court that it would be in Salina’s best interests to be placed with P.F. The juvenile court found that there was no legal bar to a natural parent petitioning the court for custody of a child after their parental rights to that child had been terminated. It concluded that HCJFS could not exclude a former mother from the group of people who could pursue placement of Salina. Furthermore, the juvenile court noted that the issue was not whether P.F. should be awarded custody of Salina, but whether she had standing to argue for custody in court.

On appeal, HCJFS argued that P.F. lacked standing because her right to parent Salina had been terminated. HCJFS contended that P.F. was attempting to relitigate the determination of permanent custody. Additionally, HCJFS argued that permitting P.F. to proceed would make permanent custody determinations meaningless, because any parent could later challenge grants of permanent custody to HCJFS.

The Court of Appeals rejected HCJFS arguments. It noted that the purpose of committing a child to HCJFS is placement of the child in a permanent family environment, had Salina been adopted P.F. would not have standing. However, since Salina had not been placed in a permanent family environment and there were no plans for her to be adopted, any person could petition for custody of her. The Court found that P.F. was not attempting to relitigate the award of permanent custody to HCJFS, but to have the opportunity to demonstrate that changes over the past seven years would make placement with her in Salina’s best interests. It concluded that P.F. was not barred from petitioning the court for custody of Salina, although she stands no better that a legal stranger, she also stands no worse.

Custody / Court Appointed Attorney Entitled to Quasi Judicial Immunity

The Massachusetts Court of Appeals affirmed the Superior Court’s order granting the defendant’s motion for summary judgment. This case came before the Superior Court on a motion filed by the child and his father as next of friend. The plaintiff argued that the child’s attorney, Ms. Benjamin, negligently made recommendations to the court, which resulted in harm to the child.

In this case, Ms. Benjamin was appointed by the Probate and Family Court as a child’s attorney for the plaintiff, J.S. As the child’s attorney, Ms. Benjamin had the same rights of any other attorney in the action. Her duties included investigating the case and filing a written report and recommendations to the court. She met with both parents, the parties’ therapists, the department of social services investigator, and reviewed all medical and psychiatric reports, in addition to the case file. In her report to the court Ms. Benjamin recommended that both parents retain legal custody of J.S., and that the father retain physical custody of J.S. and pay the mother $850 a month in alimony for five years, in order for her to find a place to live and exercise visitation rights. Additionally, the child’s attorney recommended that the mother have visitation rights with the child, which would be expanded when she found a suitable place to live.

In January 1997, at a hearing before the probate and family court judge, the parties adopted the recommendations of the child’s attorney. The judgment provided that the child’s attorney would monitor the exercise of visits between J.S. and his mother and make recommendations about visits after the mother obtained housing. In December 1997 the father sold the home he and J.S. lived in to meet his financial obligations. In November 1999 the father filed suit on behalf of himself and his child in Superior Court against Ms. Benjamin for legal malpractice.

Plaintiffs argued that Ms. Benjamin should have foreseen that her recommendations would force the father to sell his house. Additionally, plaintiffs alleged that based on the mother’s psychiatric history, Ms. Benjamin should have known that the visitation plan she recommended would cause emotional harm to the child. Ms. Benjamin filed a motion to dismiss on grounds that her work was performed in a quasi judicial capacity, and therefore she was entitled to immunity from suit. The Superior Court dismissed the father’s claims against Ms. Benjamin, because she owed him no duty and disqualified the father from representing his child. The judge denied the motion to dismiss the child’s claims against his attorney, and appointed a guardian ad litem to investigate the merits of the claim. The guardian ad litem concluded that the claim did not have sufficient merits and that pursuing the claim was not in the child’s best interests. The child’s new attorney, however, pursued the claim and filed an amended complaint alleging that the defendant was negligent in making recommendations regarding fiscal and visitation matters and her negligence resulted in harm to the child. The Superior Court granted the defendant’s motion to dismiss and the child appealed.

On appeal the child argued that the defendant was not entitled to quasi judicial immunity because she was appointed to act as the child’s attorney, therefore, she owed him the same duty as a privately retained attorney. The Court of Appeals noted that it must look at the duties the defendant was asked to perform and not merely the fact that she was appointed as the child’s attorney. The Court concluded that the child’s claims rested on the grounds that the defendant’s report and recommendations were negligent. Both the report and recommendations were duties performed by the defendant as a guardian ad litem or in a quasi judicial capacity. Therefore, the Court found that Ms. Benjamin was entitled to immunity from the child’s claims for damages.

CASE UPDATES

Gonzales v. City of Castle Rock, 366 F.3d 1093; 2004 U.S. App. LEXIS 19049 (10th Cir. 2004).

Previously reported in the Winter 2003 issue of The Guardian.

The U.S. Supreme Court agreed to review the 10th Circuit’s decision that a restraining order created a property interest protected by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The plaintiff, Ms. Gonzales filed an action on behalf of herself and her deceased daughters against the City of Castle Rock and the three police officers she had asked to enforce a restraining order against her husband on the night he killed their daughters. She claimed that her due process rights had been violated because of the police’s failure to enforce the restraining order. The trial court dismissed the complaint. The 10th Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the dismissal of the substantive due process claim, but reversed the court’s dismissal of the procedural due process claim.

The 10th Circuit relied on Roth to determine whether the restraining order was a property interest. In Roth, the U.S. Supreme Court noted that property was a “broad and majestic term” and that it protects more than actual ownership of real property, chattels, or money. A property interest is created when a person has secured an interest in a specific benefit to which the person has a specific claim of entitlement. In this case, the restraining order itself mandated that it be enforced. Additionally, the Colorado Legislature passed a series of statutes to ensure its enforcement. If the officers had probable cause to believe the court order was being violated, they were required to enforce the order by arresting the offending party or seeking a warrant.
to arrest him/her. The Court concluded therefore, that the restraining order and its enforcement statute took away the officers' discretion to do nothing and mandated that they use every reasonable means, up to and including arrest, to enforce the order's terms.

The U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear the appeal in this case, brought by the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of Florida men who sought to adopt their long-term foster children. The appeal was based on the 11th Circuit Court of Appeals decision that the Florida statute banning gay couples from adopting was constitutional. The Florida statute banning adoptions by gay individuals will therefore remain intact.

AMICUS CURIAE ACTIVITY

State ex. rel. CYFD v. Frank G., New Mexico Court of Appeals, Docket Nos. 23,497/23,787.

The New Mexico Court of Appeals ruled in support of the NACC’s position in the case In re Pamela G. The NACC filed an amicus curiae brief in support of admitting the child victim's statements made in August 2003. The New Mexico Court of Appeals ruled that statements made by a child to various social and medical workers regarding sexual abuse were properly admitted in abuse and neglect cases under the catch-all exception to the hearsay rule and medical diagnosis exception. The court concluded that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in ruling that the child could not testify in court but that prior hearsay was reliable and evidence of abuse and neglect is sufficient. Furthermore, the court pointed out that the confrontation clause does not apply to civil cases. Similar analysis, however, shows that due process was not violated because an adjudication of abuse and neglect prior to termination of parental rights was sufficiently final for appeal. The trial court retained jurisdiction to continue with judicial review and termination aspects of the case. The respondent is appealing the court's decision to the New Mexico Supreme Court.

In re CHINS petition of D.G., Supreme Judicial Court for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The NACC joined the Massachusetts Committee for Public Counsel Services Children and Family Law Program in an amicus curiae brief to the Supreme Judicial Court for the Commonwealth. D.G. appealed the juvenile court's order readjudicating her a child in need of services, without providing her an evidentiary hearing. In Massachusetts, juveniles are provided with a due process hearing at the initial CHINS hearing. The language of the state’s CHINS statute requires a hearing before a juvenile is readjudicated. The amici argue that due process requires an evidentiary hearing at the six-month review because the juvenile involved has a liberty interest at stake.

In the Interest of S.J, Pennsylvania Supreme Court, Superior Court No. 1593 WDA 2004.

The NACC joined the Juvenile Law Center in filing an amicus curiae brief to the Pennsylvania Supreme Court in support of a foster youth's right to continue to receive services until her 21st birthday. The Pennsylvania Supreme Court is reviewing a provision of Pennsylvania's Juvenile Act that allows older youth in foster care to continue to receive services until age 21 when they are in a course of instruction or treatment. This case involves S.J., an 18-year-old foster youth who is currently attending a four-year college in Pennsylvania. The juvenile court allowed S.J.'s dependency case to remain open so that she could receive case management, modest financial support, and her foster family could receive funds to provide her room and board when S.J. returns home on college breaks. The county children and youth agency appealed the juvenile court's order, arguing S.J.'s case should have been discharged when she completed high school and that the agency is no longer responsible for her well-being. The amicus curiae brief argues that youth entrusted to the care of children and youth agencies require the opportunity to receive support until they acquire skills to support themselves, and that foster youth face extremely poor outcomes when they are discharged from the system without adequate proportion and support.

In the Interest of Christopher K., Supreme Court of Illinois, No. 98597.

The NACC joined the Juvenile Law Center in filing an amicus curiae brief to the Illinois Supreme Court. The Illinois Supreme Court is reviewing the decision of the Appellate Court of Illinois regarding the application of the Extended Juvenile Jurisdiction (EJJ) provision of the Illinois Juvenile Court Act. The Illinois EJJ statute allows the juvenile judge to impose a dual or blended sentence (a juvenile sentence and an adult sentence), with the adult sentence stayed. In this case, the juvenile was arrested for homicide at the age of 14. The State's motion to transfer the case to adult court was denied, however, the State designated the case as an EJJ Prosecution. The juvenile received a blended sentence: a juvenile sentence of incarceration until the age of 21, and an adult sentence of 40 years. The adult sentence was stayed on the condition that the juvenile “not violate the provisions of the juvenile sentence.” The amici argue 1) The vagueness of the EJJ provision may hinder the rehabilitative purposes of the Illinois juvenile justice system; 2) The application of the EJJ provision after the trial court denied a transfer motion is contrary to the policies and social considerations underlying blended sentencing statutes; 3) Current psychological and social scientific studies on the mental capacity of minors demonstrate that age impacts the way in which minors invoke their right to counsel (the juvenile said “I think I need a lawyer”).

GUARDIAN CASES — NOTICE TO READERS

Decisions reported in The Guardian may not be final. Case history should always be checked before relying on a case. Cases and other material reported are intended for educational purposes and should not be considered legal advice.

Cases reported in The Guardian are identified by NACC staff and our members. We encourage all readers to submit cases. If you are unable to obtain the full text of a case, please contact the NACC and we will be happy to furnish NACC members with a copy at no charge.
As part of its initiative to empower youth involved in the child welfare and juvenile justice systems, the NACC publishes work written by youth about their experiences. This issue includes a poem from the book, I Am NOT A Juvenile Delinquent: An anthology of poetry from the creating writing program at Touchstone, edited by Sharon Charde. To obtain copies of this book please contact: Sharon Charde, 68 Reservoir Road, Lakeville, CT 06039 or Email: sharchar@sbcglobal.net

Current or former court involved youth are invited to submit essays of 1000 words or less to the NACC, along with their name, address, and phone number. If we publish it, they will be paid $100 from the Megan Louise Furth Youth Empowerment Fund. Please contact the NACC for additional information.

Warning, by L.V.

what can I say?
how can I let you know
my struggles?
I can't
I can only let you know my actions
my warning signals
I held up a red flag
o no one acknowledged it so I said whatever I wanted
did whatever I wanted went to clubs danced drank
had the time of my life but all that shit went by quick got old fast
the dudes came and went and yeah, they all had things to offer
but it didn't interest me
I needed a thrill
I got that thrill from doing illegal things now I get my thrill from doing the right things being a good person
but please next time
pay attention to my red flags before it is too late

President’s Proposed FY2006 Budget

The 109th Congress convened in January 2005, organized itself into Committees and Subcommittees (with some minor modifications thereof, compared to the structure of the last Congress), and — on February 7 — received the President’s proposed budget for Fiscal Year 2006, which will begin on October 1st.

The President’s budget proposal includes “the option for all states” to “choose an alternative system for foster care.” This is very similar language to last year’s foster care budget proposal, which has never been put into legislation; however, a foster care cap concept is included in Rep. Herger’s child welfare bill introduced last year (with a foster care cap that is NOT optional, along with a block grant that mixes intervention funding and prevention funding, without any designated funding for prevention). These proposals are very troubling.

In other child welfare funding news, the President’s proposed FY06 budget includes little more than a freeze for most programs (there is a small $6 million increase in Promoting Safe and Stable Families to $410 million, a $13 million increase in Independent Living Training Vouchers to $60 mil-

2005 Outstanding Legal Advocacy Award

NOMINATION APPLICATION

PURPOSE: The NACC is looking for people who have tipped the scales in favor of children. Many children cannot rise above their circumstances without the help of real-life heroes. Our nation’s courts, clinics, schools, homes, law enforcement agencies and social service organizations are filled with people who have made a difference. The NACC created the Outstanding Legal Advocacy Award to honor excellence in the field of children’s law, advocacy, and protection. The NACC presents its Outstanding Legal Advocacy Award annually to individuals and organizations making significant contributions to the well being of children through legal representation and other advocacy efforts. Nominees’ accomplishments may include work in child welfare, juvenile justice, private custody and adoption and policy advocacy. All child advocates are eligible.

The Nomination Letter should highlight:
- The nominee’s activities on behalf of children that have significantly promoted the protection and welfare of children.
- The history of the nominee’s involvement in child advocacy work.
- The nominee’s affiliation with children and youth service organizations.
- Any other relevant personal background information.

Nominations Must Include:
- The nomination letter
- A completed application form
- Nominee’s Curriculum Vitae / Resume
- A list of nominee’s affiliations with other children and youth service organizations

Nominations May Also Include:
- Supporting materials such as: Letters of Support, Photographs, Newspaper clippings, narratives, or other items describing the candidate’s efforts.

NACC affiliates help fulfill the mission of the national association while providing members the opportunity to be more directly and effectively involved on the local level. If you are interested in participating in NACC activities on the local level, or simply want contact with other child advocates, please contact the NACC and we will put you in touch with an affiliate in your area or work with you to form one. Affiliate development materials and a current list of affiliates with contact information are available on our website at www.naccchildlaw.org/about/affiliates.html.

Northern California
The NCACC & CFCC present: Juvenile Dependency Law: The Year in Review. March 22, 2005, 5:30–9:00 pm, State Building, San Francisco, CA
For additional information please contact Dave Bressler at 415-865-7703.
NACC Northern California members receive the NCACC’s Dependency News, produced four times a year, as a membership benefit. Non-members can subscribe to the publication for $40 for one year or $70 for two years. Please send check to NCACC Dependency News, c/o Jan Sherwood, PO Box 778, Corte Madera, CA 94976-0788.

Georgia
Congratulations to the NACC’s newest affiliate! The GACC recently launched its website www.gaccchildlaw.org and listserv for child advocates. The site contains current information on available resources for child advocates, including calendars of events and conferences, as well as a repository of motions, documents, and court orders relevant to the work of attorneys. The GACC also has a listserv that provides Georgia child advocates up-to-date communications on legislative proposals affecting children under consideration at the Georgia General Assembly. The GACC is also pleased to announce that it is expanding its reach to include guardians ad litem as a source to legislators for expertise on the legal system and the role of attorneys ad litem. As a result, bills have been filed to: 1) mandate minimum CLE requirements, 2) require that ad litems meet with their clients prior to court hearings, and 3) direct parents to submit a proposed relative placement form at the initial hearing. Join the listserv at: ctacc@yahoogroups.com.

Central Texas
The Texas Legislature is considering an extensive reorganization, including privatization, of the state child welfare system. The Central Texas Association of Counsel for Children (CTACC) has served as a source to legislators for expertise on the legal system and the role of attorneys ad litem. As a result, bills have been filed to: 1) mandate minimum CLE requirements, 2) require that ad litems meet with their clients prior to court hearings, and 3) direct parents to submit a proposed relative placement form at the initial hearing. Join the listserv at: ctacc@yahoogroups.com.

NACC – Referral Network

The NACC office receives many requests for legal services. Because the NACC does not provide direct legal services, we need to refer these people to counsel. Please fill out the following form and return it to the NACC so that we can include you in our referral network. Non-attorneys are also asked to participate.

AREAS OF PRACTICE:
- abuse, neglect, dependency
- delinquency, status offenses
- custody, visitation
- child support
- adoption
- Other: ________________________________________________________________

☐ I will consider pro bono referrals.
