So, You're Expected to Teach Fully Online....

As if the COVID-19/Coronavirus isn't concerning enough, now we all have to figure out how to deliver not only our content online but also to create classroom and school-wide communities online. AIMS is here to help! Each day for the next couple of weeks, we'll be sharing tips--mostly from all of you--for delivering distance education with an eye towards bite-sized, easily implementable pieces. Have a great suggestion that's small but mighty? Send it my way! Together we're stronger.

Creating A Feeling of Classroom Online

Have you considered how having a specific morning routine, or start of class routine can help create normalcy and a sense of stability? Some schools are offering morning announcements, the Pledge of Allegiance, announcements and, if a religious school, prayers for the entire school online. Platforms like Zoom have made their large-group meetings available for FREE for educational institutions (this is you!) through this time. Can you do circle time or warmup activities online?

Guidance for Switching to Online Learning

On March 11th and 13th, Next Vista presented the webinar below to help schools considering closing and switching to online learning. If you have questions about the content in the recording, you are welcome to contact us. The slides for this webinar are available here.

What's Different About Teaching Online?

NextVista--a library of free videos for teachers and students--has shared out a webinar of HOW to switch from teaching in person to teaching online. It's not a review of tools that you can use, it's about the pedagogy that we should all be using in order to do a good job of SHAPING the learning experience so that students continue to learn and connect. How do you care for YOURSELF in that process?
