I am glad, very glad, not to be active in any musical way, but only a thankful listener. So wrote the once noted American composer Margaret Ruthven Lang, in her 88th year, in a letter to Mrs. Edward MacDowell on June 5, 1955. (Johnston) Margaret Lang, some fifty years earlier, was known as “among the most prominent American women, whose position in the front rank of the best modern composers is no longer a question” (Program Notes, Baltimore Symphony Concert, March 14, 1901). Indeed, so well-known and regarded was Lang and her works, particularly her songs, that, in 1912, Ethel Syford in The New England Magazine described Lang thus: “It is the more sensitively poetic truth and beauty which she strives for and attains, and it is this unfailing quality which makes her songs of a higher order than those produced by any other American composer.” (Syford, 22-23)

Why would someone who was an established composer, indeed who was “in the front rank” stop composing and allow herself to be forgotten? Margaret Ruthven Lang (1867-1972) published her first works in 1889 and went on to compose some 140 songs, solo piano pieces and chamber and orchestral works. Lang was the first American woman to have a work performed by a major American orchestra with her Dramatic Overture, Op. 12 performed by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Arthur Nikisch on April 7, 1893. Her works were championed by Edward MacDowell and noted performers of the day including Ernestine Schumann-Heink, Dan Beddoe and Alma Gluck. Lang’s publishers were Arthur P. Schmidt, Oliver Ditson and Theodore Presser; she received royalties into the early 1950s. Yet, about 1917, at the age of 50, Lang stopped composing. She lived some 50 more years and devoted much of her remaining years to religious work and taking care of her elderly mother. While she kept meticulous business records of her published pieces, she destroyed many of her works, including her orchestral scores, following perhaps in the footsteps of her father who had all of his works destroyed at his death.

Margaret Lang was from the Lang family of Boston, the daughter of the prominent musician Benjamin Johnson “B. J.” Lang (organist, pianist, conductor and founder of the Cecilia Society and the Apollo Club) and Frances Burrage Lang, a singer. She was raised in an exceptionally musical home where she knew Dvořák and Paderewski as guests. The Langs knew Liszt and his daughter Cosima, Hans von Bülow and Richard Wagner, and Margaret knew the Wagner children as playmates. Margaret Lang studied with her father, Chadwick, Paine and Parker and also, as did many American composers in the late 19th century, in Germany. Her music shows the influence of the German Romantic tradition, along with some French and occasional Eastern styles, all combined to create her own American sound.

When asked in 1967 why she stopped composing, Lang’s answer was: “Why did I stop, I had nothing to say.” (Mullins) In her own biographical notes in 1960 she states, not without a bit of pride, “My music writing stopped soon after The Heavenly Noel’s many performances in many places, with orchestra; with piano; and once at request, with organ, piano, and harp; - for much-involved housekeeping took place during my mother’s last housebound years.” (Lang) Theodore Presser published her final composition, Three Pianoforte Pieces for Young Players, op. 60, in 1919.

With the outbreak of WWI many German-trained composers turned away from the country of their studies and sought other models. Was Margaret Lang also a part of this turning away from the German model? If her training was no longer a part of American culture and the public was no longer pro-German in feeling, perhaps she stopped compos-
Margaret Lang also turned to religion and started publishing missives and booklets which she called “Messages from God.” These writings seem to have occupied much of her time and she was very happy to write them, publish them and send them to churches at her own expense; she described this as being done “anonymously, but with deep devotion” and “my life’s best work.” (Lang) Did this creative activity then act as a substitute for composition? Margaret Lang lived out her life on Brimmer Street, in Boston’s Back Bay. As a “thankful listener” she also has the distinction of being the longest subscriber to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Orchestra performed a concert in 1967 in honor of Lang’s 100th birthday and installed a plaque on her seat, first balcony right, B1. Not one for ostentation, she could not be found at the reception honoring her after the concert because she had left early to catch the last train home as she had always done.

Although Lang destroyed most of her orchestral music and her studies, most of her songs and some piano works survive in libraries and collections throughout the US. Lang’s life, career and music represent a fascinating contribution to America’s musical history. As Rupert Hughes said in Contemporary American Composers in 1900, “Personally, I see in Miss Lang’s compositions such a depth of psychology that I place the general quality of her work above that of any other woman composer. It is devoid of meretriciousness and of any suspicion of seeking after virility; it is so sincere, so true to the underlying thought, that it seems to me to have an unusual chance of interesting attention and stirring emotions increasingly with the years.” (Hughes, 438)

Works Referenced
Baltimore Symphony Orchestra. Program Notes, March 14, 1901.
Lang, Margaret Ruthven. Diary, Sept. 29, 1892, Lang Family Papers, Boston Public Library as quoted in Blunsom.

The Doug Seroff Collection at the Center for Popular Music

The Center for Popular Music at Middle Tennessee State University has recently added an exceptional collection on southern music to its holdings. The Doug Seroff African American Gospel Quartet Collection contains materials gathered and developed over thirty years of research by Seroff on the history of this important and influential musical style. It includes audio and video recordings, over 300 photographs (many unique), research notes, files of newspaper articles, and manuscripts dating from the 1870s through the 2000s documenting the rich history of quartet singing in Tennessee and Alabama.

The collection primarily chronicles the golden era of gospel quartet singing as practiced by groups like The Spirit of Memphis, The Swan Silvertones, and the Fisk Jubilee Singers. The personal manuscripts of John Battle, a founding member of the Grammy winning Fairfield Four quartet of Nashville, Tennessee, are included. Other highlights include audio and video recordings of historic performances, radio/TV appearances, quartet rehearsal sessions, and interviews with performers. A detailed finding aid for the contents of the collection is available from the Center for Popular Music. To access the collection, contact the Center for Popular Music by phone 615-898-2449, e-mail at ctrpopmu@mtsu.edu, or visit the Center online at http://popmusic.mtsu.edu/.

SAM Bulletin Moves Online

Beginning with the Winter 2012 issue of the Bulletin, the Society will be disseminating this publication primarily electronically. You will need to indicate on your renewal notice if you would prefer to have a print version mailed. If you do not communicate a preference on your renewal form, it will be assumed that you are content with an electronic version of the Bulletin.

Please make sure that we have your correct email address in the database. Check your Membership Directory! If you have any questions, please contact the SAM office at SAM@american-music.org or call us 412-624-3031.
New Instrument Collection at Nicholls State University

Nicholls State University in Thibodaux, LA, is in the process of building a new instrument collection. Supported by a Louisiana Board of Regents’ Traditional Enhancement Grant institutional technology match for $44,000, the collection, headed by Nicholls librarian Melissa Ursula Dawn Goldsmith, the collection will include folk instruments (for example, a zydeco accordion and a Cajun rub board and triangle) as well as historic instruments (Western Art music), music therapy instruments, instruments for the disabled, and world music instruments. The grant also supports an interactive space for curriculum materials and collaborative learning for music instruction/the teaching of music within the library. New computers and keyboards will help engage students who wish to learn how to read music notation, play an instrument, study music theory, or compose. The space will eventually become the new Arts-Media center—a self-contained interactive learning center that will include instruments, multimedia, scores, sound recordings, and music resources.

2011 Meeting of the Music of Latin America and Caribbean Interest Group: Music of the Americas and the College Curriculum

During the 2011 SAM conference in Cincinnati, participants of the Music of Latin America and Caribbean Interest Group gathered together for a session on ways to integrate American music, specifically the music of Central and South America, into the college curriculum. Two panelists, Alejandro Madrid and Brenda Romero, and a respondent, J. Peter Burkholder, were invited to share their thoughts on the importance of including Latin American music within the broader music history sequence. They were encouraged to offer their experiences with incorporating Latin American music into existing courses, as well as to suggest pedagogical techniques they have found useful in teaching this material.

The first speaker, Alejandro Madrid (University of Illinois at Chicago), presented a provocative paper that challenged the core foundation on which our music education system is built. He asserted that the current practice of teaching American music has been shaped by nationalism and argued that this method is largely outdated in today’s age of post-nationalism and multiculturalism. To illustrate his point, Madrid reflected on how nationalism has affected our understanding of music in the United States, stating that musicology has validated a bifurcated racial (black-white) view of “American music,” thereby elevating jazz and classical art music above other types. In turn, this has led to a marginalization of various ethnic groups (and their music) that are part of the U.S. and caused a lack of consideration for other kinds of music important to African American communities.

Madrid called for a revolution of pedagogical practices within our music education system. He advocated for “the study of sound, its meaning, and its organization within specific cultural and social contexts” within a postnational framework, which would allow for a more cosmopolitan understanding of music free from nation-State boundaries and ideologies. As an example, Madrid noted the absence of Latin American music within music history survey texts, stating that this absence reflected the “invisibility of [Latin American] culture within the mainstream discourse of U.S. national identity.” Instead of broadening the current canon of repertoire to include select works from Latin American countries, Madrid proposed an approach that “recognizes the historically transnational musical flows between the U.S. and Latin America; an approach that ultimately aims at dismantling the myth of U.S. exceptionalism.” This type of postnational discourse would be aligned with current trends in cultural studies, breaking through the walls of the field of music and connecting to the questions being asked by the larger intellectual community.

Brenda Romero (University of Colorado at Boulder) also called for rethinking the current pedagogical attitude toward Latin American music. She emphasized the need to teach beyond the musical work itself and suggested that scholars broaden the content being taught by addressing the socio-political contexts (poverty, slavery, imperialism) that led to the creation of the music. Additionally, Romero insisted that musicologists grapple with the extra-musical issues of racism and prejudice in order to convey accurately the development of music in Central and South America, and she recommended the book Skin: A Natural History by Nina Jablonski as a helpful reference for someone trying to dismantle these topics. Romero also encouraged the inclusion of live performances by local immigrant musicians (when available) within the classroom. As Romero stated, live performances “make visible and tangible” those who make the music, thereby allowing students to connect the music itself to the people and their socio-political conditions.

After thanking Madrid and Romero for their presentations, J. Peter Burkholder (Indiana University) offered his response. He began by summarizing his perspective on Western music, which he had outlined in a recent article, “Music of the Americas and Historical Narratives,” published in American Music (2009). Burkholder argued that musicologists should acknowledge the importance of the “transatlantic tradition”—the transmission of music between Europe and the Americas that occurred in parallel to the musical developments within Europe—in order to understand and communicate

continued on page 36
the full historical narrative of Western music. He described how this viewpoint influenced his revision of A History of Western Music, stating “I have tried to include music of the Americas, from Argentina to Canada, as part of the narrative and repertoire taught in traditional music history surveys that use a textbook like [A History of Western Music]. Music of the Americas now takes up about 13% of the textbook, up from less than 1% in its first edition.” In addition to weaving the narrative of American music from the 16th century to present day throughout the textbook (now in its eighth edition), Burkholder included thirty musical works from the United States and three Latin American selections in the current anthology.

Burkholder commented positively on the innovations proposed by the other two panelists, but he also defended his position as a reformer who makes small but significant modifications. He addressed how his editorial role allows him “to broaden the coverage and refocus the emphases [of the text]…[but] not to write a completely different book.” He contended that making reforms and rethinking the discipline are not necessarily mutually exclusive, arguing “incremental change is change.” He noted that many music programs now include courses in jazz, popular music and non-Western music in addition to standard courses in the classical tradition, and he also cited examples of scholars who have been grappling with the more radical concept of “what music does” in exciting and interesting ways. In light of Burkholder’s philosophy, each of us—whether a reformer or a revolutionary—can help transform how the music of the Americas is integrated into the classroom.

Jennifer L. Campbell, co-chair

---

FROM THE PRESIDENT

Dear Friends and Colleagues,

The Officers and Board of the Society for American Music have been hard at work this past spring and summer thinking about, discussing, and exploring ways to implement many of the suggestions that emerged in our Long-range Planning retreat last September, and from both the online survey that we conducted last January and the subsequent open forum at the our conference in Cincinnati. I would like to describe some of the ideas and proposals we have been discussing since last meeting as a Society in March 2011.

The various discussions and comments made it quite clear that one of the most important goals facing our Society is the need to define clearly our mission as a scholarly organization, and to ensure that our efforts are all designed to further that mission. This means, in short, that we need to identify our niche and put our efforts into activities that might help distinguish our society from others (like AMS, SEM, IASPM, etc) whose members also study American music topics. We have been exploring some ideas with these goals in mind.

One way to set ourselves apart is to make our conference more distinctive—less dominated, for example, by the paper-session format that is the norm in our discipline. This is particularly appropriate because, according to the survey, many SAM members consider the national conference to be one of our most important activities. Several years ago, in fact, the Board started to discuss new approaches, and recently implemented two changes: poster sessions and the seminar format. The former have been popular and widely accepted; the jury is still out, however, on the latter. We will probably give the seminar format a trial of several more conferences before making a final decision on whether or not to keep it as regular part of our conference.

In the last several months, however, we have been discussing two other conference-related ideas. The first is to make our meetings more interdisciplinary. We have long attempted to reach out to scholars in other fields (mostly music-related) by holding joint conferences with other scholarly organizations. The problem, however, is that such multisociety conferences tend to be simultaneous meetings rather than joint ones, with a minimum of the true meeting-of-the-minds that is our goal. For this reason, we are experimenting with the idea of setting aside several time-slots in the conference program to accommodate sessions that are co-sponsored by SAM and another society. A good example of this is a pair of sessions that will be part of our upcoming meeting in Charlotte, organized in conjunction with the Society of Historians of the Gilded Age and Progressive Era (SHGAPE); these sessions were planned by Joe Horowitz (SAM) and Alan Lessoff (SHGAPE), and were accepted by the Program Committee. This was done in rather an ad-hoc manner this year, but the Board will be discussing in September the viability of jointly sponsored sessions in the future—perhaps with small and more-specific music-related organizations (The Charles Ives Society comes to mind, or the North American British Music Studies Association), or—perhaps even better—with societies outside our discipline (history, American studies, theatre or art history, sociology, and so forth).

Such joint sessions might open up our research and thinking to input by scholars in disciplines completely outside of music, whose work could valuably inform our own, but whose scholarly societies would probably not be interested in a joint meeting. If you have ideas or opinions about this concept, please let me know.

Another conference-related idea that we have been discussing, and that is also coming to fruition, is the proposal that SAM sign on as a co-sponsor of smaller regional or niche conferences. In late February 2012, in fact, the Alfred Newman Symposium for Musico logical Film Studies will be co-sponsored by SAM, the USC Cinematic Arts Library and Warner Bros. Archive, and the Institute for Film Music Studies. By the time you are reading this, you will have seen the call for papers. There are probably many other “niche” conferences that many of us attend that would be perfect events for co-sponsorship from SAM. One example is the second biennial North American Conference on 19th-Century Music, which I attended at the University of Richmond this past July. The papers presented there were almost evenly divided between European and American topics, and the synergy was marvelous. Attendance was strong, but co-sponsorship from an organization like SAM might have created a higher profile for the meeting. We consider such collaborative events to be beneficial in many ways. First, it can be viewed as a response to some of our members who suggested (in the survey) that we create local chapters for regional meetings. Although the LRPC believes that we are not ready yet to go to that level, piggy-backing onto smaller regional meetings might serve much the same purpose by being part of a conference that is more local in nature. Second, since the Society would be co-sponsoring (not organizing), there would be little financial cost to us. Third, by lending our name and prestige to the smaller organization or meeting, we both help the niche conference and benefit from the publicity. The Board will be discussing this idea at our September meeting, but informal conversations suggest a real interest in pursuing this idea vigorously, and we solicit ideas and suggestions for collaborative opportunities in the future.
continued from page 36

Finally—and again, in response to issues discussed by the LRPC and raised in the survey—the Development Committee has been hard at work identifying ways that the Society can facilitate research in American music, which was identified by an overwhelming majority of respondents as the principal raison d’être of the Society. The committee has had four conference-call meetings over the summer, and we are currently exploring the establishment of travel-to-collections fellowships. We have discussed creating an undesignated fellowship (perhaps named for a major contributor) to help pay for travel to a library or archive (similar to the Dena Epstein fund of the MLA), and are also investigating the possibility of creating collaborative short-term residencies at one or more major libraries or repositories around the country (see Larry Hamberlin’s essay below for further information). At the moment we are just in the talking stages, so please do not flood us with applications! But we solicit your ideas about such residencies and fellowships. And if you are interested in helping the Society raise funds for—or even to endow—fellowships of this nature, please be in touch.

I am always interested in your ideas, comments, opinions about the Society. If you have such, please zap me an email (kkpres@wm.edu). I hope to see many of you at the meeting in Charlotte!

A Note from the Development Committee

As you probably know, earlier this year SAM’s Long-Range Planning Subcommittee conducted an online survey or our membership, which has yielded valuable information about our shared values and priorities. A report on the survey at our March meeting in Cincinnati spurred some lively discussion and a sense that now is the time for our organization to make concrete plans based on this information. As chair of the Development Committee, I am pleased to say that work is underway to make SAM an even more effective organization for the promotion of American music.

Foremost among our shared values is the importance of scholarship on American music, which 95% of our respondents ranked as a core value. Likewise, our greatest challenge is a dearth of funding for that scholarship. While this is certainly not the only area in which progress can be made, it clearly stands out as a top priority for those of us on the Development Committee. For that reason, we have focused our work to date on creating new opportunities for funded research in American music.

At the forefront of these new opportunities are plans for residencies at some of our nation’s leading research institutions and collections, which SAM is currently developing in collaboration with those institutions. Under discussion are collaborative short-term residencies at the Library of Congress, the Newberry Library, the Center for Black Music Research, the Huntington Library, the Harry B. Ransom Center, the American Antiquarian Society, and the New York Public Library.

Also in the works are new sources of funding for travel to these and other collections. A third project in development will support the creation and maintenance of online digital collections. Further down the pipeline are efforts to support publication, conference travel, and greater diversity and inclusivity within our membership.

All of these initiatives are currently in the planning stages. Your ideas and suggestions are welcome, whether they pertain to creating new opportunities for research or—better yet—to raising funds for these projects, which ideally would be endowed. Feel free to contact me at lhamber@middlebury.edu.

Larry Hamberlin
Middlebury College
Chair, Development Committee

Looking ahead to Charlotte

The annual meeting in Charlotte is still months away, but preparations for the Silent Auction and Student Forum Panel are already underway. The Student Forum organizes additional events at the meeting, and we are always looking for volunteers to help. If you’d like to get involved, please contact one of the co-chairs: Brian Jones (jonesbl@email.unc.edu) or Jennifer Myers (jennifer.myers@u.northwestern.edu). To find out more about the Student Forum, visit our page on the SAM website and sign up for the Student Forum Listserv. Also, look for us on Facebook! Sarah Suhaldonik has created a group specifically for the Student Forum. Please join us!

Silent Auction

The Silent Auction, held annually at the Society meetings, supports the Student Travel Endowment. As always, we will be seeking donations of books, audio/visual recordings, and other related materials for the auction. All donations are tax deductible, and they can be shipped in advance of the meeting or brought directly to it. There will be an official call for donations in the next bulletin, but we encourage everyone (both students and the general membership) to start thinking about items now to donate this year.

continued on page 38
The auction is coordinated entirely by Student Forum. If you would like to help with planning, acquiring materials, or running the auction, please contact co-chair Brian Jones (jonesbl@email.unc.edu). You just might end up finding your own treasures in the process.

— Brian Jones and Jennifer Myers

continued from page 37

In Rave Culture: The Alteration and Decline of a Philadelphia Music Scene, Tammy L. Anderson provides a sociological analysis of the Philadelphia rave scene, using qualitative, ethnographic methods. Notably, the historical scope of her ethnography (2003–2005) encompasses neither the emergence of the rave scene nor its pinnacle, but rather a period of waning that is characterized by uncertainty and change.

Raves can be loosely defined as all-night parties where DJs perform various genres of electronic dance music (hereafter, EDM), usually in unlicensed venues like warehouses, lofts, and studios. Although the American EDM scenes of the mid-1980s (i.e., garage in New York City, techno in Detroit, house in Chicago) featured events that fit this description, it was not until the late 1980s, when Chicago’s “acid house” sub-genre caught on in England and fused with a neo-hippie ethos brought back from summers in Ibiza, Spain, that the term “rave” was coined to label this particular cultural phenomenon.

Raves went global during the next decade, spreading through hotspots in

continued on page 39

— Luis-Manuel Garcia

The Society for American Music is pleased to welcome these new members

Nicolas Cherone, Newton, MA
Russell Clark, Urbana, IL
Judy Core, Tampa, FL
Gregg Geary, Honolulu, HI
Mary Kunz Goldman, Buffalo, NY
James-Christopher Kilbourne, St. Petersburg, FL
Tiffany Kuo, Claremont, CA
Kery Lawson, Iowa City, IA
Tamara Livingston, Roswell, GA
Erin Maher, Carboro, NC
Megan Murph, Baton Rouge, LA
Susan Taffe Reed, Wyalusing, PA
Meghan Schrader, North Andover, MA
Stefan Wolf, St. Paul, MN
Leah Weinberg, Ann Arbor, MI
Andrew White, Washington, DC
Natalie Zelensky, Alexandria, VA

The Bulletin of the Society for American Music

The Bulletin is published in the Winter (January), Spring (May), and Summer (September) by the Society for American Music. Copyright 2008 by the Society for American Music, ISSN 0196-7967.

Editorial Board
Editor. .................. Kendra Leonard (kendraprestonleonard@gmail.com)
Reviews Editor. .................. Patrick Warfield (pwarfield@mac.com)
Design and Layout .................. Allison Gallant (allisongallant@gmail.com)
Indexer. .................. Laura Pruett (Laura.Pruett@merrimack.edu)

Items for submission should be sent to Kendra Leonard in the body of or as an attachment to e-mail. Photographs or other graphic materials should be accompanied by captions and desired location in the text. Deadlines for submission of materials are 15 December, 15 April, and 15 August.

We look forward to seeing you in Charlotte!

— Brian Jones and Jennifer Myers

Journal of the Society for American Music
http://journals.cambridge.org/sam
Volume 5, Number 4 (November 2011)

Contributors

Articles
A “League Against Willan”? The Early Years of the Canadian League of Composers, 1951–1960
Benita Wolters-Fredlund

The Origins of “Dissonant Counterpoint”: Henry Cowell’s Unpublished Notebook
John D. Spilker

Carrie Allen

Reviews
Books
Beverley Diamond, Native American Music in Eastern North America: Experiencing Music, Expressing Culture
Chad Hamill

Marie Elizabeth Labonville, Juan Bautista Plaza and Musical Nationalism in Venezuela
Walter A. Clark

Robin Moore, Music in the Hispanic Caribbean
David Garcia

Recordings
Wetaq “It Sounds Good”: Historic Recordings of the Mi’kmaq, produced by Janice Esther Tulk
Ann Morrison Spinney

The Oregon String Quartet, And All That Jazz: Jazz and Rock Influences in the Contemporary American String Quartet
Julia Bullard

Edwardearsall
Continental Europe, India, Australia, and the Americas. In North America, this began in the early 1990s in urban centers like New York, Toronto, Los Angeles, and San Francisco; by the middle of the decade, raves had exploded in popularity and could be found in nearly every mid-sized city across the US and Canada. Although there now exist several book-length accounts of EDM scenes—many of them grounded in a specific city—Anderson's is the first to focus on a declining EDM scene; and, correspondingly, her most innovative and useful contributions come from her analysis of the factors that cause a scene to change, and the kinds of cultural work carried out by the actors who shape this change.

After an introductory chapter, Anderson prepares her analysis with a chapter dedicated to EDM events, providing a six-fold taxonomy: underground parties, corporate raves, music festivals, monthlies, weeklies, and superstar one-offs. Chapter 3 creates a typology of EDM participants arranged symmetrically into two groups of three: insiders (loyalists, stakeholders, hustlers) and outsiders (clubbers, pretenders, spillovers); she also enumerates the biographical factors that attract people to EDM: social alienation, avoidance of dominant gender/sexuality norms, and technological fascination. In Chapter 4, Anderson catalogs the various forces of change in the Philadelphia rave scene: generational schism, commercialization, formal social control, genre fragmentation, and cultural otherness/hedonism/self-destruction. Cultural work is the theme of Chapter 5, where she classifies the activities of EDM participants—particularly stakeholders—as restoration, preservation, or adaptation. Anderson travels to London and Ibiza in Chapter 6, where she encounters still-vibrant—but altered—EDM scenes and compares them with Philadelphia to determine which factors contribute to alteration, and which contribute to decline. She closes the book with an epilogue (Chapter 7) that summarizes the conclusions of previous chapters, ponders the future of EDM scenes (in brief: not very good), and provides brief descriptions of two "twenty-first century" nightlife scenes: gay men's "circuit parties" and "mash-ups." She also includes an appendix that details the project's methods of ethnography, data collection, and data analysis.

This condensed summary gives some idea of the intense proliferation of typologies in this book, which engendered some problems that I will discuss later.

The main strengths of Anderson's study are its richly detailed ethnography, its synthesis of a broad range of sociological scholarship, and its focus on an EDM scene in decline, which produces an original contribution to the study of change in music scenes. Anderson situates the Philadelphia rave scene in its historical, social, and spatial context, providing the sort of descriptive detail that both bolsters her analysis and lends a vivid immediacy to the anecdotes that populate the book. She blends observation, interviews, and media-analysis to develop a rich ethnographic archive that she mines deeply and meticulously for insights on how the scene works—and, sometimes, how it does not work. Anderson also displays a broad knowledge of sociological work on relevant topics; nearly every chapter accumulates a bibliography that will be of interest to scholars of music scenes whose training is primarily anthropological or humanistic. Ultimately, the greatest value of Anderson's work can be found in the latter half of the book, where she enumerates the factors that contributed to the decline of the Philadelphia rave scene (Chapters 4–6). She engages with scholarship in social studies as well as with interviews of people active in the rave scene to detail how these factors impacted the scene and what people did in response to these pressures. She then compares the rave scene in Philadelphia to that of London and Ibiza in order to glean potential explanations for why some scenes decline and others flourish.

The introductory chapter opens with a brief ethnographic anecdote, followed by a short history of EDM, an account of the development of the project itself, a description of the research site, a review of the relevant scholarship (particularly on scenes, subcultures, and neo-tribes), and an overview of the book's structure. Anderson discloses here that she only discovered the rave scene in the early 2000s, cleverly making her entry into the Philly rave scene part of her ethnographic methodology as well as the narrative framing device for her interest in the twilight years of the scene: having arrived after the peak years, she found herself surrounded by talk of a bygone era of plenitude. This also foreshadows a problem in Anderson's analysis; she entered a scene in the midst of change and uncertainty and assumed that the accounts she received of "authentic" raves were disinterested reports, thus failing to take into account nostalgia and the cultural work of historiography. Her definition of an "authentic" rave is based on the reports of scene "insiders," for whom rigid and conservative definitions may have served the rhetorical purpose of registering dissatisfaction with the current scene or barring entry to new forms of EDM nightlife.

While preparing this review, I mentioned the title of Anderson's book to a fieldwork contact hailing from the Philadelphia rave scene who had been active there during the time of Anderson's research. "What decline?" he said, "The house scene is pumpin' right now." Anderson's book, however, has an answer for him: these house music parties he was describing are not raves, but inauthentic and commercialized club events that have abandoned much of what makes raves special. This may seem like a harsh and nostalgically conservative judgment, but it follows directly from Anderson's analysis (see, for example, her descriptions of "weeklies" and "monthlies," pp. 38–43). As I will argue below, the gap between these two accounts of what a rave is—and the status of its continuity in Philadelphia—reflects an analytic gap in Anderson's work regarding the politics of authenticity.

Anderson situates her study within the field of "scene studies," drawing on the work of Will Straw, Andy Bennett, and Richard Peterson. There is some conceptual and methodological diversity in scene studies, however, and Anderson seems to side mostly with Straw, defining a scene as a nexus of cultural activity taking place in a geographically-bounded space; this organizational definition could be contrasted with Barry Shank's semiotic conceptualization, which describes a scene as an "overproductive signifying community" (Shank, 122). In the former case, a scene is defined by how it is organized, in the latter, it is defined by what it (over)produces. In both cases, music scenes are distinctively animated by activities that blur the lines between performer and audience, producer and consumer. While Straw's model may be most compatible with the goals of her project, perhaps Shank's definition of a scene as semiotic overproduction might have provided a subtler instrument for tracing the boundaries and continuities of the rave scene. Additionally, while Anderson’s literature review provides a valuable archive of work from sociology, communication, and media studies, prominent anthropological work by scholars such as Anthony D’Andrea, Charity Marsh, and Graham St. John is virtually absent.

Each chapter in this book is structured around the development of a typology of some aspect of EDM scenes (e.g., types of events, types of participants, forces of change for the Philadelphia rave scene). Although Anderson provides detailed ethnographies of interviewees and thorough analyses of interview data, her consistent drive to schematize (and occasionally quantify) her qualitative data ultimately diminishes the descriptive richness of her work. Considering the messy complexity and constant flux of EDM scenes (and music scenes anywhere, I would venture), the static tidiness of her categories already raises concerns. She initially defines them as heuristic, Weberian “ideal types”—that is, abstract types that do not correspond to any real phenomenon, but instead help to make sense of the chaotic diversity of the social world. Through the course of the book, however, these ideas come to be reified; they drift from “ideal” to “real” types that determine the limits of what is legible as a “rave” event, person, factor, or activity.

For example, Anderson provides a typology of EDM participants in Chapter 3 that happens to fall into two symmetrical columns of “insiders” and “outsiders” (pp. 54–56). Insider loyalists identity strongly with rave culture and show allegiance to the scene through frequent attendance at events and patterns of consumption typical of connoisseurs (e.g., the collection of rare vinyl records), whereas outsider clubbers are committed to attending EDM events, but are more general in their tastes and less aware of subcultural markers. Insider stakeholders are mostly DJs and promoters, taking an active role in organizing the activities of the scene and maintaining its health, while outsider pretenders seek temporary and “counterfeit” loyalty to the scene in order to garner some form of social capital. Finally, insider hustlers are opportunistic entrepreneurs that provide support services (e.g., maintaining websites and discussion forums) and work in a secondary economy (e.g., selling drugs), while outsider spillovers find themselves at EDM events through convenience or accident, but have no affinity with EDM or rave culture.

According to Anderson, these “ideal types” were developed in dialogue with her insider informants (p. 55); how does this impact the manner in which this typology describes insiders and outsiders? She admits that there is possibly a gatekeeping agenda at play in her informants’ definitions, and so she reminds us that these labels have no real-life referents; but what is the explanatory power—the descriptive usefulness—of using terms and distinctions that carry such pejorative (or valorizing) charges? What are the consequences of presenting a photo of a young man—centrally framed with his face clearly visible—accompanied by a caption labeling him a “pretender” (p. 69)? At points such as these, it is not clear whether Anderson is describing or performing the cultural work of her insiders.

A related problem that subvendors this book is Anderson’s notion of authenticity, which carries a lot of analytic freight in her work but remains underdeveloped. In Chapter 2, for example, she observes EDM events, interviews insiders, and analyzes print media to assemble an inventory of eighteen elements characteristic to “authentic” raves (p. 32). This already raises concerns about salience, as she does not differentiate between the relative importance of these characteristics: do glow-sticks matter more to ravers than a multinational beverage corporation’s logo plastered all over the event space? Which characteristics contrast most strongly with other nightlife scenes? She then takes this eighteen-dimension descriptive space and flattens it out to a one-dimensional line: the “rave-club culture continuum,” which also doubles as an authentic-commercial continuum. In the position most similar to “rave” (and therefore most authentic) she places underground parties, while superstar “one-off” events occupy the most commercial pole. In between these two poles, from most to least authentic, are corporate raves, music festivals, monthly parties, and weekly parties.

This linear model is problematic because it implies an a priori cultural difference between rave events and club events, between which gradations of difference can be traced, whereas raves and clubs are more like overlapping cultural fields within a larger field of EDM, with rhizomatic connections and no central-
One can see this in how she frames these three types of cultural work: a subsection in her discussion of restoration is entitled, “The Restoration Challenge” (p. 121), while the corresponding subsection on preservation is entitled, “The Preservation Quagmire” (p. 125), and the subheading for adaptation simply reads, “Integration of EDM into the Commercial Music Industry” (p. 128). These subheadings imply that restoration is difficult but productive, preservation is futile and unproductive, and adaptation is all too easy and destructive (or over-productive, if one is tracking the capitalist production of value).

There is no conceptual space here for rave scenes to transform into something new and remain faithful to their “roots.” What if, for example, certain changes in the rave scene are considered a move towards authenticity by EDM participants? Anderson already points out that many of her informants appreciated the shift to nightclub events and the reliable amenities of these spaces, e.g., functioning toilets and a sound-system that works (pp. 84, 90), but “improvement” is not an operative term in her analysis. What if some ravers see the raves of the “golden era” as aspiring towards a plateau that has not yet been reached? Transformation, then, would be the most authentic kind of work. Picking up again on rave’s history of utopianism and futurism, if one wishes to retain some notion of authenticity, then one must also consider the possibility of being authentic to a scene that is yet to be realized. Nonetheless, if one drops the authentic/commercial binary and keeps a critical distance from the concept of authenticity, this tripartite division of scene-maintaining labor is useful and helpful. It can give clarity about how energies are directed, and why scene participants can sometimes seem to be acting at cross-purposes.

Similarly, Anderson’s work in Chapter 4 on the various factors (social, cultural, economic, legal, pharmacological) that have placed pressure on existing EDM scenes is invaluable. Not only does she assemble a tentative vocabulary for articulating scene change, but she also synthesizes previous scholarship on EDM from two intellectual streams that often remain isolated: deviance-oriented paradigms (criminology, epidemiology, and public policy in particular) and ethnographies/historiographies. She also begins to theorize how these forces interact with each other and what kinds of reactions they elicit from EDM scenes. This is expanded in the penultimate chapter (Chapter 6), where she conducts similar fieldwork in London and Ibiza. Although the ethnographic data for these locales is thinner and still analyzed through a problematic set of typologies, it illuminates her analysis of the Philadelphia rave scene and allows her to hypothesize which forces tend to steer scenes toward alteration rather than decline.

Anderson’s book remains innovative in many regards and richly descriptive of a particular place and time, although its claims are weakened by its reliance on typologies that alternately reproduce social hierarchies and flatten difference. The chapters on forces of change (Chapter 4) and cultural work (Chapter 5) will be of interest to any scholar of EDM scenes and scene transformation in general, although it may be difficult to disentangle these valuable insights from the problematic typologies upon which they are built. In a classroom setting, this book has both advantages and disadvantages. On the one hand, the proliferation of labels and categories can be frustrating for those closely acquainted with EDM while also confusing or misleading for others. On the other hand, these typologies also provide footholds for critical reading, as students can engage with specific definitions and trace how concepts impact analysis. Similarly, Anderson’s clear and accessible writing style will help students follow the trajectory of her argument and evaluate her claims. In an upper-level undergraduate or graduate course, it may be illuminating to read this book alongside another EDM ethnography that is less schematic or even explicitly anti-structuralist, which could spark a discussion about contrasting methodologies and theoretical frameworks.

Works Referenced

— Robert R. Grimes

Salvatore Basile has written a fascinating book, but one that took me some time to appreciate. Even before I had been asked to review Fifth Avenue Famous: The Extraordinary Story of Music at St. Patrick’s Cathedral, I had begun reading the work. I was initially dispointed with it because it did not meet my expectations—expectations raised by the work’s subtitle; this is more a history of musicians at New York’s St. Patrick’s Cathedral than it is a history of the music. The author admits that in the early days of the twentieth century music at the church “would for a while be less interesting than the image of its musicians” (p. 63), but his work seems to indicate that this is true throughout most of St. Patrick’s history. While the author does provide titles of some musical pieces performed at the Cathedral, the book does not delve deeply into the musical, cultural, and sociological questions involved in a period of American urban Catholic liturgical music that emerged from the continued on page 42 operatic repertory of the late nineteenth century, developed in the Gregorian-revival of the early twentieth century, and underwent remarkable changes during the second-half of the twentieth century. What Fifth Avenue Famous does, and does well, is chronicle the careers of the men and woman (the incumbent is the only female director of music at the Cathedral) who have led the musical life of St. Patrick's through the years. Once I had adjusted my expectations, I enjoyed the book considerably.

In the mid-nineteenth century, a number of Catholic churches in Manhattan vied for the reputation as the most musical in the city. St. Peter's on Barclay Street (the first Catholic parish in the city), St. Stephen's on East 28th Street, and St. Francis Xavier on West 16th Street, developed formidable musical reputations, and were said to receive the latest Italian compositions in manuscript form even before they were published. The city's newspapers at times "reviewed" the musical performances at Sunday High Mass, and often parishes appeared to compete with one another for bragging rights as to the best prima donna or the newest composition. The author sometimes seems to engage in this rivalry. For example, he writes that William Pecher, who would become the first musical director of the cathedral on Fifth Avenue, was in 1862 at St. Peter's on Barclay Street, a church whose musical significance, he writes, was then "anchored in the past" (p. 2). That very year Dwight's Journal of Music reported that St. Peter's "has been celebrated among fine-art critics and church-goers for the sublimity of its sacred music" (June 28, 1862: 100). Old St. Patrick's Cathedral, located between Mulberry and Mott Streets on the lower East Side (and still functioning today as a Catholic parish), did not have an equal musical reputation. Basile's work, however, focuses almost exclusively on the present St. Patrick's.

The book gives us a close look at what the life of a church musician in New York City must have been like over the last 150 years. Even for a musician as successful as the director of music at St. Patrick's Cathedral, life was difficult—long hours and low pay. James Ungerer, the second director of music at the new Cathedral, had to petition the Archdiocese for an increase in his pension so he could afford to enter a nursing home in his final days. Fortunately, his request was approved. In the 1970s and 1980s, John Grady doubled as music director at the Cathedral and organist for the Metropolitan Opera.

Since the earliest days of Christianity, there has been tension over the role of music in Christian worship, and the years since the new St. Patrick's Cathedral opened in 1879, right up to the present are among the most tumultuous. It is clear the author does not side with the late nineteenth-century Cecilian movement that sought to return Catholic Church music to plainchant, Renaissance polyphony, and modern compositions modeled on these. Nor is he sympathetic to the motu proprio, Tra le Sollecitudini, of Pope Pius X in 1903 that banned orchestras, "theatrical" music, and women from Catholic choir lofts. He never directly mentions the work of the monks of Solesmes on plainchant, and gives only an oblique reference to them in mentioning that the assistant organist of the Cathedral spent three months studying "the method of singing and teaching the chant" with the Benedictines on the Isle of Wight, where the French monastery was in exile during the first decades of the twentieth century (p. 68). The approach of the Second Vatican Council was greeted with "rumors of extravagant, possibly unwelcome, change" according to the author (p. 173), although the changes that ensued did lead to the dismissal of the all-men's choir and brought a new ensemble of men and women, as well as the return of orchestral music, to the cathedral.

We also see the delicate negotiations that take place between the musical director and the clergy as competing goals come into conflict. In the 1930s the rector of the Cathedral lamented that Pietro Yon, perhaps the finest musician to head the music at St. Patrick's, "has a great reputation as a musician but he rarely gives us the sort of music our people care for" (p. 115). In the 1980s John Cardinal O'Connor informed then music director John Grady that Offertory anthems were "to run no longer than three minutes and twenty seconds" (p. 241). Mozart was not the last musician to have trouble with his archbishop.

There are so many fascinating facts contained within its pages that I wish the book included more documentation than it has. A few examples will suffice. Beethoven's Missa Solemnis was apparently sung by the Cathedral choir in a liturgical context “on extraordinary occasions” (p. 47); these must have been extraordinarily long occasions. The Italian organist and composer, Pietro Yon, director of music at the Cathedral from the late 1920s into the early 1940s, tutored Cole Porter in music theory and composition. Roy Harris was commissioned to write a setting of the mass for the Cathedral in 1948—a commission completed but never performed at St. Patrick's. Mary Lou Williams’ Mass no. 3 (better known as Mary Lou's Mass in its choreographed form by Alvin Ailey) was performed in the Cathedral in 1975. There are, however, a few inaccuracies; for example, Mozart's Requiem was not performed at John F. Kennedy's funeral, but rather in his memory at the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in January of 1964 (p. 183). For musicologists—and perhaps especially for graduate students in musicology—this work is most valuable for both the history it records and the questions it leaves unanswered. What was the real impact of the 1903 instruction of Pope Pius X that banned women from singing in Catholic choirs—only reversed in 1955 and actually honored at St. Patrick's, unlike many other Catholic parishes in the United States? Why is there no scholarly work on Pietro Yon, an influential musician in New York City and beyond through much of the first half of the twentieth century? This work could easily serve as a springboard for a number of doctoral dissertation topics.

The author, who is a soloist and cantor at St. Patrick's, is clearly in love with the Cathedral and its tradition of music making. That love shines through, and he at times minimizes the difficulties and problems for music there, for example, the need to amplify the choir to overcome the air-conditioning system in the vast building. There is undoubtedly a great tradition of music at St. Patrick's Cathedral, and each year on Christmas Eve there is no hotter ticket in town than one to Midnight Mass at "St. Pat's." Salvatore Basile has done a wonderful service in documenting the work of those who have made the tremendous musical history of the Cathedral possible.
The American composer George Rochberg (1918–2005) continues to fascinate, although perhaps less for his music than for his famous ‘conversion’ from hard-core serialism to old-fashioned tonality. The most popular story, circulated widely in program notes and radio commentaries, has it that Rochberg embraced nineteenth-century harmonic procedures because he found that an atonal vocabulary was incapable of expressing the range of grief he felt in the early 1960s when his teenaged son was stricken with and eventually succumbed to brain cancer. A less romantic but more credible story, easily gleaned from a careful reading of certain of the essays collected in The Aesthetics of Survival: A Composer’s View of Twentieth-Century Music (University of Michigan Press, 1984/2004), attributes the shift in style to a crisis of artistic conscience. Writing on the centennial of Arnold Schoenberg’s birth, Rochberg, in an article for Perspectives of New Music, likened the inventor of the twelve-tone method to the central character of Hermann Hesse’s 1927 novel Steppenwolf. In a paragraph remarkable as much for its literary grace as for its insight, Rochberg observed that just as Hesse’s protagonist suffered less from genuine lycanthropy as from a “sickness of the soul” triggered by his being caught “between two ages, two modes of life,” so Schoenberg was a comparable “genius of suffering”, whose “internal experiences, particularly those recorded in his works from 1908/09 on, present us with an almost precise parallel to [Harry] Halle’s spiritual journey into hell.” Informed by other essays in the Aesthetics of Survival collection, a reader need not spend much effort to realize that Rochberg, in his eloquent comparison of Schoenberg’s spiritual agonies to those of Hesse’s fictional werewolf, was in fact writing in large part about himself.

An uninhibited first-person account of the agonies experienced by an artist “born” into one tradition yet at heart committed to another surely would make for a good read. Such an account, alas, is not to be found in Five Lines, Four Spaces. Penned in the few years before Rochberg passed, then edited by Rochberg’s widow and University of Pennsylvania music librarian Richard Griscom, the book deliberately focuses on the brighter aspects of an up-and-down, still controversial career.

Rochberg does not exactly dodge the big question. He admits that his rejection of serialism remains a “thorny” issue, “a matter of sufficient magnitude to warrant returning to any number of times” in a valedictory memoir. But he alludes to it far more often than he addresses it, apparently feeling that he had dealt with it quite enough, and with due intellectual rigor, in earlier writings. (See, for example, “The New Image of Music” (1963), “The Avant-Garde and the Aesthetics of Survival” (1969), “Reflections on Schoenberg” (1972), “Reflections on the Renewal of Music” (1972), and “On the Third String Quartet” (1974), all in the Aesthetics of Survival collection.) Preferring to make short what obviously could be a very long story, Rochberg notes that his radical change of style was “the outgrowth of a powerful positive, balanced by an equally powerful negative.” He sets up the dichotomy in no uncertain terms: what Rochberg calls “the positive” has to do, in essence, with craft, tradition, beauty, expressiveness, and sincerity; in contrast, “the negative” equates to the modernist movement that “from its inception sought to obliterate all vestiges of the past in all art, not just music” (pp. 31–32; emphases original).

That having been stated, up front and with a commendable economy of words, the rest of the book is by and large a recital of all the wondrous things that Rochberg experienced over the years. The reader will find here a bounty of lyrically descriptive praise for this or that performer who responded sympathetically to whatever Rochberg was trying to get at before and after his famous ‘time of turning.’ There is considerable detail, for example, on his relationships with Isaac Stern, the Concord String Quartet, guitarist Eliot Fisk, and conductor Christopher Lyndon-Gee (who in 2002 undertook the recording of all of Rochberg’s orchestral works with the Saarbrücken Rundfunk Orchestrata). But there is virtually no engagement here with the many critics who thought the Schumann- and Brahms-like quartets (nos. 4–6), written in 1977–78 for the Concord Quartet, were ridiculously anachronistic; there is no explanation of why he felt it so necessary to severely ‘tighten’ his Violin Concerto after Stern premiered it in Pittsburgh in 1974 and then felt it just as necessary to ‘restore’ it in 2001, or of the possible reasons as to why his one and only attempt at opera (an adaptation of Melville’s The Confidence Man, premiered at the Santa Fe Opera in the summer of 1982) was generally regarded as a theatrical disaster. As is the privilege of an octogenarian, Rochberg here opts to paint a rosy picture of his life in music. Yet it is a picture washed over with bitterness.

Even in the first terse description of the “powerful negative” one finds reference to the “false prophets” of modernism and the “acrimonious modernist proselytes and zealots who still linger on in academic nooks and crannies” (pp. 32–33). Later one reads about “the oppressive, radical aesthetics of the avant-garde of Europe and America” (p. 64), about “the aesthetic death grip, the domination and intimidation of serialism” (p. 104), about student composers with “few or no observable skills” and attitudes “strongly tinged with solipsism” (p. 125), about people who equate composing with “arbitrarily throwing together abstract conglomerates” (p. 144), about the “powerful polemists” who launched a “direct attack” on musical virtue (p. 260). Digs of this sort permeate Rochberg’s ostensibly cheery memoir, and they lead one to wonder why the author, toward the end of his supposedly ‘resolved’ career, still kept such a chip on his shoulder. They lead one to wonder, too, about why Rochberg never explains exactly what it was that drew him, in the first place, so strongly to the modernist techniques that later he repudiated.

One does not read a memoir such as this in the hopes of ‘catching’ the author in a contradiction. It is easy enough to set Rochberg’s dismissal of modernist music in general as mere “illustrations of theoretical-analytical thought processes” (p. 106) alongside his descriptions of the enthusiasm with which he once explored “the inner workings and uncharted subtleties of the twelve-tone world” (p. 254), or to juxtapose his demonization of “the

continued on page 44
trous, the unshakeable belief in a world that is not only controllable, but, to some extent, predictable. The nostalgia that drives much of the film's narrative is a reflection of this desire for order and control, a longing for a world that never existed or at least a world that was more stable, more certain. It's a world where the music is as much a reflection of the characters as it is a commentary on the state of the world.

This brings us to the crux of the symposium's themes: the relationship between music and the film industry. The panelists were united in their belief that the role of music in film has been greatly underestimated and underappreciated. They argued that the music of film is not just a backdrop, but a crucial component of the storytelling. It's a tool that can be used to enhance the emotional impact of a scene, to create a sense of place, or to express a character's innermost feelings.

The symposium was a powerful reminder of the importance of music in film, and a call to action for those who are interested in exploring this important aspect of film studies. As the symposium was coming to a close, the panelists were left with the same question they started with: How do we continue to explore and celebrate the music of film?
reflexivity and self-representation. Among topics to be considered might be: Victorian ideas of progress and degeneration; social commentators, ethnologists and journalists; parliamentary reports and reform movements; mirrors, disguises, and masquerades; visions of heaven and hell; utopias/dystopias; photography and portraiture; autobiographies, biographies and histories; museums and exhibitions; and Victorian psychology and theories of identity. The conference will include a panel on teaching the Victorians, and proposals for topics and speakers are also invited. Held on the beautiful campus of Indiana University, the conference will include unique evening entertainment honoring Dickens, including a special film screening of the 1917 A Tale of Two Cities with live piano accompaniment, and a “Charles Dickens Variety Show” including music and magic lanterns. Accommodations are at the Indiana Memorial Union. Please submit an abstract! Papers or full panels are welcome, and should include 500-word abstracts and 1-page (only) vitae by October 20, 2011 to conferecnsubmissions@midwestvictorian.org. For more information, see our website, http://www.midwestvictorian.org.

CFP: Sounds of the City

Charlie Gillett’s pioneering The Sound of the City declared, with its title, that the electrified roots music of Elvis and Little Richard was an urban synthesis: “In rock and roll, the strident, repetitive sounds of city life were, in effect, reproduced as melody and rhythm.” But the metropolitan modernities of popular music take many different forms: Nuyorican salsa, Ralph Ellison “living with jazz” in his apartment building, San Francisco open-air psychedelia, double dutch and breakdancing, Amadou & Mariam’s “fast food air psychedelia, double dutch and break- apartment building, San Francisco open-

CFP: International Society for the Promotion and Research of Wind Music (IGEB)
Proposals for papers or lecture-performances are invited for the 20th conference on wind music of the International Society for the Promotion and Research of Wind Music (IGEB) to be held in Coimbra, Portugal, July 12-17, 2012. The deadline for proposals is January 23, 2012. Papers focusing on the theme of the conference, “On the Border: Bridging the Path Between Tradition and Art” are especially invited, but papers on any aspect of wind music and research in progress are welcome. The lectures can represent the entire field of humanities in relation to wind music: musicology, ethnology, philosophy, sociology, and educational sciences. Presentations should not exceed 20 minutes, leaving 10 minutes for discussion. Papers will be considered for future publication in the Alta Musica series. Researchers are encouraged to submit abstracts on works in progress. Send a one-page abstract to Bernhard Hbla at bernhard.hbla@kug.ac.at and Doris Schweinzer at doris.schweinzer@kug.ac.at. Registration materials and further information may be found at www.igeb.net.

CFP: NABMSA Conference 2012
The 2012 conference of the North American British Music Studies Association will be structured around the theme of Anglo-American music and musical relationships. NABMSA is especially interested in papers that explore these connections, such as those on British brass bands in America, British-American folk traditions, and other transatlantic collaborations and influences. Proposals for performances and lecture-recitals of works with an Anglo-American angle are also invited, as are papers that draw upon interdisciplinary or broader cultural contexts and papers on figures or works celebrating important anniversary years in 2012 (e.g., Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, Frederick Delius, Tippett’s King Priam). Graduate students are encouraged to submit; the best student paper presented at the conference will be awarded the Temperley Prize. Abstracts of up to 500 words for 20 minute individual papers, for paper sessions of up to four papers, or for lecture recitals lasting 40-50 minutes should be sent by February 1, 2012, to Kendra Leonard by e-mail to kendraprestonleonard@gmail.com. For additional information about the conference, see www.nabmsa.org.

Prize: Thelen Prize 2012
IGEB (The International Society for the Promotion and Research of Wind Music) invites nominations for the 2012 Thelen Prize. Established to commemorate Fritz Thelen (1906–93), one of IGEB’s co-founders, the prize is awarded to the writer of an outstanding dissertation in the field of wind music research. Nominations, including self-nominations, are invited for dissertations completed between 2009 and December 2011. Dissertations may be on any subject concerning wind music, in any language, from any country, worldwide. In addition to a plaque, the winner will be invited to present a paper at the next meeting of the Society, to be held in Coimbra, Portugal, July 12-17, 2012. The dissertation will also be considered for publication in IGEB’s Reprints und Manuscripts or the Alta Musica series. The titles and abstracts of all submitted dissertations will be announced in the Mitteilungsblatt, the Society’s Newsletter. Nominations should include the following: one paper copy; one pdf file; and curriculum vita. The deadline is October 24, 2011. Send to: IGEB, c/o Doris Schweinzer, Leonhardstraße 15, A-8010 Graz, Austria; or Doris.Schweinzer@kug.ac.at. For further information see: www.igeb.net.

Hosted by the Arts Center at Strathmore (Bethesda, Md.) and supported by the NEA and the Ives Society, the Ives Project engages the pianist Jeremy Denk and the baritone William Sharp (both supreme Ives advocates) in a strategy for better acquainting American audiences with the Ives idiom. The Project includes songs, chamber works, and the Concord Sonata; letters, essays, and historic recordings; lecture/recitals by both Denk and Sharp; and talks by Tom Owens and myself. Further information: http://post-classicalensemble.org/current-program/.
New from Oxford

Victory through Harmony
The BBC and Popular Music in World War II
CHRISTINA L. BAADE
“Christina Baade’s Victory through Harmony is that rare thing—a genuinely interdisciplinary book that is good at all the things it takes on.”
—Anahid Kassabian, The University of Liverpool
2011 304 pp. 25 photos Hardback $45.00

Preaching the Blues
The Life and Times of Son House
DANIEL BEAUMONT
“Preaching the Blues achieves what any music biographer most aspires to. It makes a reader want to seek out the music it describes.”
—Charles R. Cross, The Seattle Times
2011 224 pp. 40 photos Hardback $24.95

Seeing Through Music
Gender and Modernism in Classic Hollywood Film Scores
PETER FRANKLIN
“[Franklin] serves up luscious accounts of how music produces its powerful effects in favorite movies.”
—Susan McClary, Professor of Music, UCLA
(Oxford Music/Media Series)
2011 208 pp. 28 photos Hardback $39.95

The Making of Cabaret
Second Edition
KEITH GAREBIAN
“The Making of Cabaret is smart, witty, insightful and full of the spirit that has made this groundbreaking musical such an enduring work of art.”
—Amanda Denhart, theatre director
2011 256 pp. 37 photos Hardback $99.00 Paperback $19.95

Radio’s Civic Ambition
American Broadcasting and Democracy in the 1930s
DAVID GOODMAN
“A brilliant contribution to the history of American broadcasting.”
—Jason Loviglio, author of Radio’s Intimate Public
2011 368 pp. 29 photos Hardback $49.95

The Oxford Handbook of The American Musical
Edited by RAYMOND KNAPP, MITCHELL MORRIS, and STACY WOLF
The only truly interdisciplinary guide to the musical
(Oxford Handbooks)
2011 480 pp. 10 photos Hardback $150.00

Transnational Encounters
Music and Performance at the U.S.-Mexico Border
Edited by ALEJANDRO L. MADRID
This book explores the transnational connections that inform the large diversity of musical traditions from the U.S.-Mexico border while keeping an eye on their powerful local significance, in an attempt to redefine notions like “border,” “nation,” “migration,” “diaspora.”
2011 448 pp. Hardback $99.00 Paperback $35.00

Cosmic Cowboys and New Hicks
The Countercultural Sounds of Austin’s Progressive Country Music Scene
TRAVIS D. STIMELING
“Stimeling has done an outstanding job of exploring the social, cultural, and political implications of this important yet often misunderstood musical phenomenon.”
—Dr. Gary Hartman, Director, Center for Texas Music History, Texas State University-San Marcos
2011 192 pp. Hardback $35.00

New Atlantis
Musicians Battle for the Survival of New Orleans
JOHN SWENSON
“New Atlantis is a fast-moving hybrid of richly detailed journalism and compelling partisan memoir.”
—Rolling Stone
2011 320 pp. 50 photos Hardback $27.95

Bright Star of the West
Joe Heaney, Irish Song Man
SEAN WILLIAMS and LILLIS O’LAOIRE
“Bright Star of the West examines the life, repertoire, and influence of Ireland’s greatest sean-nós (old-style) singer, Joe Heaney (1919-1984).”
(American Musicspheres)
2011 264 pp. 16 illus. 32 music ex. Hardback $35.00

The History of Jazz
Second Edition
TED GIOIA
“The definitive work: encyclopedic, discriminating, provocative, perceptive, and eminently readable.”
—Washington Post Book World
2011 452 pp. 10 photos Paperback $19.95

Oxford Bibliographies Online
OBO: Music combines the best features of a high-level encyclopedia and a traditional bibliography.
aboutobo.com/music

NEW IN PAPERBACK

The Sound of Broadway Music
A Book of Orchestrators and Orchestrations
STEVEN SUSKIN
2011 672 pp. 10 illus. Paperback $34.95

Singing Out
An Oral History of America’s Folk Music Revivals
DAVID KING DUNAWAY and MOLLY BEER
(Oxford Oral History Series)
2011 272 pp. 16 illus. Paperback $18.95

How The Beatles Destroyed Rock ‘n’ Roll
An Alternative History of American Popular Music
ELIJAH WALD
2011 336 pp. Paperback $16.95

Claiming Diaspora
Music, Transnationalism, and Cultural Politics in Asian/Chinese America
SU ZHENG
(American Musicspheres)
2011 448 pp. Paperback $29.95

indicates titles with companion websites. Visit oxfordwebmusic.com for more information.
588,500 items in Sibley Library
20 full-time faculty theorists and musicologists
5 full-time faculty composers

One shared passion.

Eastman celebrates 90 years of creating and studying American music.

Ricardo Zohn-Muldoon directing Eastman Broadband.

Priority application deadline November 1
Final application deadline December 1
www.esm.rochester.edu/apply
Further information is available at the website (www.american-music.org) or by contacting the SAM office.

H. Earle Johnson Bequest for Book Publication Subvention
This fund is administered by the Book Publications Committee and provides two subventions up to $2,500 annually.

Sight and Sound Subvention
This fund is administered by the Sight and Sound Committee and provides annual subventions of approximately $700-$900.

Irving Lowens Memorial Awards
The Irving Lowens Award is offered by the Society for American Music each year for a book and article that, in the judgment of the awards committee, makes an outstanding contribution to the study of American music or music in America. Self-nominations are accepted.

Wiley Housewright Dissertation Award
This award consists of a plaque and cash award given annually for a dissertation that makes an outstanding contribution to American music studies. The Society for American Music announces its annual competition for a dissertation on any topic relating to American music, written in English.

Student Travel Grants
Grants are available for student members who wish to attend the annual conference of the Society for American Music. These funds are intended to help with the cost of travel. Students receiving funds must be members of the Society and enrolled at a college or university (with the exception of doctoral students, who need not be formally enrolled).

Mark Tucker Award
The Mark Tucker Award is presented at the Business Meeting of the annual SAM conference to a student presenter who has written an outstanding paper for delivery at that conference. In addition to the recognition the student receives before the Society, there is also a plaque and a cash award.

Adrienne Fried Block Fellowship
This fellowship, endowed in honor of Adrienne Fried Block, shall be given to support scholarly research leading to publication on topics that illuminate musical life in large urban communities. Preference shall be given to projects that focus on the interconnections among the groups and organizations present in these metropolitan settings and their participation in the wide range of genres that inform the musical life and culture of their cities.