Proposal Abstract

The Public Philosophy Network seeks a grant of $5,000 in support of its second conference on Advancing Public Philosophy to be held at Emory University March 14-16, 2013. The total estimated cost of the conference is nearly $50,000, with about $14,000 coming from registration fees; $25,000 from the conference center subvention fund; and $3,000 from Emory's graduate school. Having the American Philosophical Association help sponsor the conference signals that publicly engaged work is an important priority for the profession.

Purpose and Benefits to the Profession

The March 2013 conference will bring philosophers together with various sorts of public practitioners to explore ways to advance publicly engaged philosophy, including collaborative projects and rethinking the boundaries of philosophy. Like the first conference, which was held in October 2011 in Washington, DC, this conference will center around participatory workshops that create rich spaces for collaboration, learning, and exploring how to "do philosophy" in a public way. We expect attendance of about 200, including graduate students, full faculty, policymakers, and public interest activists.

For two full days, each morning and afternoon, eight sessions of workshops and panels will run concurrently on topics such as food policy, climate change, public health, human rights, and global development. We have already sent out a call for proposals for workshops, papers, and organized panels, requesting an overview of the subject to be addressed, names of other possible panelists in and out of academia, and a description of how the workshop will be highly participatory. After we have chosen the workshops, we will send out a call for participation, asking for details of one's interest in and experience with the subject. We will limit each workshop to no more than 20 participants, organizers included. This method, which we employed at our last conference, rounds out the conference very well, and it solicits ideas the organizers might not anticipate. For example, last time graduate students from Yale University organized sessions on poverty and global change, bringing in two renowned philosophers, Henry Shue of Oxford and Thomas Pogge of Yale.

In addition to professors and graduate students in the humanities and social sciences, we are inviting participation from activists, policy makers, and journalists involved in public issues with philosophical dimensions. Locally this may include staff at the Carter Center, at the Centers for Disease Control, the Southern Poverty Law Center, and CNN.

The benefits to the profession are many. The conference

- shows how philosophy can engage across disciplines and beyond the academy to address issues of public concern;
- brings philosophy more fully into the public scholarship community alongside national movements such as Imagining America;
- extends the work of the APA's Committee on Public Philosophy beyond division conferences;
- provides opportunities for networking; and
- models collaborative teaching, research, and scholarship.

Established Groundwork and Relationships

The Public Philosophy Network is a young but already well-established network with dense connections throughout the profession and across traditions and areas of focus. It grew out of a day-long meeting at the 2010 Pacific Division meeting of the American Philosophical Association during which forty philosophers discussed what public philosophy is and how and why its practice should be supported. The consensus of the group was that there was a need for an independent network that would support and nurture a full range of publicly engaged philosophical projects, provide a space for philosophers interested in publicly engaged work to network with one another, and develop workshops that would foster philosopher-practitioner collaborations.

In the two years since, the PPN has made great strides on all these fronts. It launched a collaborative website in the fall of 2010 (<http://publicphilosophynetwork.ning.com/>) and held its first conference in October 2011 in Washington, DC, with over 200 in attendance, including graduate students, full faculty, policymakers, and public interest activists. Two months later the Chronicle of Higher Education ran a very positive article about PPN, "Philosophers Put Their Minds to Expanding Their Role in Public Affairs." (<http://chronicle.com/article/Philosophers-Put-Their-Minds/130066/>) With that coverage along with the buzz from the first conference and PPN's website the PPN has quickly grown to over 600 members in the space of just two years.

In addition to the leadership of co-directors Noëlle McAfee and Sharon Meagher, the Public Philosophy Network has benefited from the informal leadership and/or financial support of many philosophers, departments, and programs throughout the country. The initial advisory committee included philosophers Lewis Gordon, John Lachs, Andrew Light, Eduardo Mendieta, Elizabeth Minnich, John Stuhr, and William Sullivan. Other organizing and leadership efforts have come from Adam Briggie, Ellen Feder, Robert Kirkman, Christopher Long, Sarah Clark Miller, Gwynne Taraska, Paul Thompson, and Nancy Tuana, and Kyle Powys Whyte. Centers and programs that have supported PPN include the American Philosophical Association, the APA Committee on Public Philosophy, the Institute for Philosophy and Public Policy and the Center for Global Ethics at George Mason University, the Rock Ethics Institute at Penn State, the Center for the Study of Interdisciplinarity at the University of North Texas, the Laney Graduate School and the Emory Conference Subvention Fund at Emory University. PPN has also benefited from the participation of Anita Allen, William Galston, Mark Sagoff, Henry Shue, Mary Rawlinson, Thomas Pogge, and Eric Weber, among many others.

Plan and Timeline

- May 2012: Signed contract with conference venue
- June 2012: Call for proposals issued
- August 1, 2012: Proposal deadline
- September 1, 2012: Finalize schedule and notify those who submitted
 Complete fundraising
 Issue call for participation
- October 2012: Call for participation due
 Notify participants
- November 2012: Open up remaining space in workshops to those who register
- Jan. & Feb. 2013 Complete local arrangements
- March 14-16, 2013 Conference held at the Emory Conference Center

Fiscal Agent

The fiscal agent for the conference will be Emory University. Funds will be managed through Noëlle McAfee's research account with bookkeeping done by the philosophy department administrator, Frances Campbell.

Other Funding

The total estimated cost of the conference is nearly $50,000, with about $14,000 coming from registration fees; $25,000 from the conference center subvention fund; and $3,000 from Emory's graduate school. We also expect that partner universities will provide some funding.

Post-Event Assessment

We will write up a report of the conference within a month of the event, which we will put on the website.

Advertising Plans

An announcement of the conference and the call for papers is on the PPN website: <http://publicphilosophynetwork.ning.com/page/public-phil-conference>

We have also circulated the CFP to the following organizations' listservs and / or websites:

Agriculture, Food and Human Values listserv
American Philosophical Association
Association for Practical and Professional Ethics (APPE)
Feminist Ethics and Social Theory (FEAST)
International Association for Environmental Philosophy (IAEP)
ISEE-L (int'l society env. ethics) listserv philosop
Society of Women in Philosophy (SWIP)
Society for Phenomenology and Existential Philosophy (SPEP)
STS-grad listserv

Website

The Public Philosophy Network's website <http://publicphilosophynetwork.ning.com/> is built using social networking software and enables members (philosophers and community-based partners) to network with one another on issues of common concern. Individuals join PPN via the website. Current membership is more than 675 members.

In addition to posting the conference announcement and CFP, the PPN website will support the conference as follows:

- as the portal for registering for the conference;
- as a way for workshop organizers to communicate and share information with participants prior to and after the conference; and
- as a space for ongoing work through affinity groups.

A prior APA grant helped fund the website, which is now sustained through institutional PPN memberships and external grants. We believe that the success of our first grant demonstrates our ability to build the Public Philosophy Network into a sustainable organization.

Accessibility

The venue, the Emory Conference Center, is accessible. We will also ensure that any off-site space we may choose for other events will be accessible as well.
