Andrew has spoken across the United States and contributed as a writer for ARMA's Information Governance Body of Knowledge (IGBOK). Andrew has a myriad of certifications in various subjects including information governance, records management, privacy, security, and project management. Andrew is a former adjunct professor at Davenport University and taught global project management and the technology capstone courses. He holds a Master of Science in Administration with a concentration on Information Resource Management from Central Michigan University.

Why do I want to serve on the ARMA Board of Directors?

Now that ARMA has merged with the Information Governance Coalition, and has the IGBOK ready for the world I feel compelled to help. ARMA has gone through a lot of change over the past decade, and it is time to take our knowledge and training to the global community. Having spent time in work groups for both the RIM Competencies update and the IGBOK, I have seen first hand the resources and capabilities of the ARMA staff and volunteers. I have also seen what Information Governance can do for organizations and organizations need our help. By continuing to arm our members with the Information Governance knowledge they need, and showcasing success stories, we can truly make a difference.
