

We have been so lucky that our small island, St. Eustatius, has been preserved after Irma and Maria. The only damages were a few roofs blown off, some trees down and exfoliated by the power of the wind. For the rest, everything has been preserved: dive center, boats, hotels, roads and all infrastructures. We have the feeling today we are an oasis in the middle of a chaos.

St Maarten's Princess Juliana International Airport, one of the Caribbean's most important air hubs, has reopened for commercial operations. Delta resumed flights this Tuesday and KLM on October 29 and other connecting flights out of Princess Juliana's Airport have returned to operation.

In addition WinAir resumed their flying schedule to and from St. Eustatius on a daily base

Irma and Maria changed the life of thousand of people in the area. They changed ours as well, but we are ready, more than ever, to accept the challenge. We are ready to continue our dive activity and to welcome our diving friends in order to make them dream again in our beautiful marine park.

Once again, we encourage you to come and visit us! That would be the best support ever.

We hope to see and speak to you all in booth 2049 at the coming DEMA show.
And don't miss our presentation about our island

The gorgonians are still standing! A damage assessment by the Sint Eustatius National Parks Foundation (STENAPA) shows minimal damage on our reefs.
