

LaNitra Berger, Ph.D.

LaNitra Berger is director of fellowships in the Honors College at George Mason University. Throughout her career, she has worked toward helping underrepresented students gain access to transformational educational opportunities. Since joining the Honors College in 2010, LaNitra has helped secure more than 50 prestigious national scholarships and fellowships such as the Boren, Fulbright, Truman, and Critical Language Scholarship, many of whom are first-generation or minority students. She has helped more than 25 students receive Fulbright awards. Currently, she is working with IIE and the US State Department to develop initiatives that support diversity and inclusion in the Fulbright US Student Program. LaNitra serves on several education abroad advisory boards, including NAFSA, the AIFS academic advisory board, and Globalize DC. She previously served as director of leadership and international programs at the National Association for Equal Opportunity in Higher Education (NAFEO), where she managed a federal internship program and helped minority-serving institutions develop campus internationalization strategies. During her tenure at NAFEO, LaNitra organized three national dialogues on diversity in international education, bringing together college presidents, federal agencies, ambassadors, and nonprofit leaders together to improve access to study abroad. She received her MA and PhD in art history from Duke University and a bachelor's degree in art history and international relations from Stanford University. LaNitra has studied abroad in Paris, was an exchange student at the Free University in Berlin, and conducted field research in Cape Town. She is the author of the NAFSA guide, "Exploring Education Abroad: A Guide for Racial and Ethnic Minority Participants" and is the editor of the forthcoming NAFSA volume, "International Education and Social Justice."
