Through an impressive collection of work from leading and emerging scholars, this book assembles a phenomenal body of knowledge on the making of public spaces for and with young people. Through a framework of why, how, and what (cases), the book is packed with lessons, and investigations that offer tools for engaging young people in the making and activation of public space. It leaves the reader thinking about place-making in new ways, highlighting how not having appropriate outdoor spaces impedes young people’s social and intellectual development, and defining our adult responsibility as building environments where we are not needed.
