

Ann Hellman Ph.D., RN, is an Associate Professor at Tennessee Technological University Whitson-Hester School of Nursing. She received her PhD in Nursing with an emphasis on nursing research and nursing education. Her research explores sexual assault recovery; the role that spiritual beliefs and religious practices have on the recovery process; sexual violence, domestic violence, and dating violence preventative practices on a college campus; efficacy of virtual reality simulation on sexual violence preventative skills building including bystander intervention; building an effective community coordinated response team; and community reaction to sexual violence education and prevention practices. Ann also researches areas of nursing education and student learning. She is active in working to prevent violence against women since 2014. Ann is active in community organizations addressing the issues of sexual violence, domestic violence, and dating violence, particularly in the campus community.
