Vaclav Stetka, Loughborough U, UNITED KINGDOM

An understanding of populism has never been more important in light of the recent social, political and economic tumult, and developments in transnational media cultures. While populism is a well-documented feature of modern politics, the communicative, media and cultural aspects of populism have been underexplored. This preconference aims to explore this in a global context to shine a conceptual and empirical light on populist communication and culture across the world.

PRECONFERENCE: Examining the Construction of Roma Identity, Voice and RepresentationSponsored Sessions

This panel focuses on Romani experiences in Europe, specifically as they relate to identity and media use. This panel will bring together scholars and activists who work alongside minority communities and invites those interested in Roma rights, and more generally, minority rights, to discuss identity creation, media representation, and the challenges that these groups experience. With the conference taking place in Prague this year, this panel aims to include local discussions to the international conference.

This preconference explores the conceptual, methodological and pedagogical possibilities of design research in the field of communication. What are the material and social arrangements that produce the artifacts that exist in nearly every aspect of our everyday life? How might we understand these artifacts better if we engage with them in designerly ways? We aim to engage scholars working in a variety of fields and formats to begin outlining the core contributions of design—as a method and object of study—within communication.

This preconference aims to shed light on the role of mass or social media during the European refugee crisis. The ongoing migration of refugees seeking shelter within the borders of Europe has fueled the development of increasingly polarized societies within Europe, with some political or societal actors stressing humanitarian values and others stirring fears of religious threats and rising terror. The media play a central role in this development; they set the agenda for public discourse, identify problems or challenges and may provide solutions that may lead to the peaceful integration of refugees in European countries. The refugee situation has also shown just how central digital and social media communication are in many European citizens' lives, with Facebook and Twitter functioning as first sources of (perhaps untruthful) information, as well as potential platforms for political radicalization.

PRECONFERENCE: Trust, Control and Privacy: Mediatization of Childhood and Adolescence in the Digital AgeSponsored Sessions

The mediatization of childhood and adolescence challenges concepts of trust, control and privacy as well as their interrelation. This preconference looks at trust, how it is constructed, negotiated and practiced in context of young people's lives. We want to discuss the various concepts of trust, control and privacy with regards to children, adolescents and their families. In addition, we are interested in relating this to questions of media literacy and its significance in a mediatized society.

For 15 years, the ICA Mobile Preconference has been an interdisciplinary gathering of scholars, researchers, and practitioners who focus on mobile communication research. In recent years, the mobile preconference has been organized in the form of several interactive Blue Sky Workshops. These provide a venue where scholars can present, learn and discuss their latest ideas, research and skills around a limited number of themes related to mobile communication and mobile media. In this year's workshop, we particularly wish to provide an opportunity for graduate students and new faculty to interact with more experienced mobile researchers, thereby cultivating a supportive and integrated community of mobile scholars. Ideas discussed and presented at the mobile preconference have consistently nourished the theoretical and methodological foundations of mobile research, have started joint research projects and have eventually led to publications in peer-reviewed journals.

In this preconference, we will scrutinize the persistent and emergent intersections between media and human rights in relation to sociocultural, political and economic dynamics. The objective is to contribute to knowledge and debates on the crucial ties between human rights and the media in a globalizing and digitizing world. Both the challenges and opportunities (e.g., mediated humanitarian intervention vis-à-vis the question of desensitization of audiences to suffering) presented by such macro dynamics are considered.

The preconference reviews the performative and expressive dimension of our routine engagement with media. It brings together scholars from media and communication, anthropology, and sociology to scrutinize the kind of agency necessary to articulate voices and to consider how voices are expressed, represented or muted. With that, the preconference strives for an explanation and critical appreciation of media-related practices as a perennial issue and a pervasive exercise in which we find ourselves immersed.

Scholars and researchers are invited to explore the nature, dynamics and regulation of the tensions that can be identified between monophonic and polyphonic forces. They are encouraged to focus on communicational events, whether in the context of organizations, political parties, governments, public debates, tribunals, psychiatric treatments or mundane conversations. We particularly invite participants to theorize and analyze the mobilization, articulation and conciliation of alternative voices, such as the voices of facts, absent or dead persons, ecosystems, spirits, or texts, among others.

This will be the first graduate student preconference of the Environmental Communication division, which the division plans to do every year hereafter. The preconference will bring together a group of graduate students working on environmental communication projects and provide them with the opportunity to present and discuss their projects in a constructive environment. It will also allow students to receive feedback from senior scholars and to establish collaborations with peers. The event will provide an additional venue outside of the main conference for students to present their work, especially for advanced Masters students and new PhD students who are new to ICA.

This preconference emerges from the ongoing refugee crisis at the Mediterranean Sea, calling for dialogue between scholars and practitioners interested in the roles played by Communication regarding this multifaceted challenge. Although the event is open to cover different humanitarian crises worldwide, the urgency and relevance of this topic appeals to the scholarly commitment to propose applied solutions to decision-making bodies and involved organizations. Discussing the role of mass and new social media, and intercultural communication in this context turns into a must for our research community.

This preconference will focus on pedagogical innovations using deliberative pedagogy, a method of teaching recently publicized in the Michigan State U Press 2017 book, Deliberative Pedagogy: Teaching and Learning for Democratic Engagement. Participants will engage the theory of deliberative pedagogy and think about it for their particular institutional and pedagogical contexts. Three faculty (from the United States, Israel, and Romania) will co-lead this preconference.

PRECONFERENCE: Embracing the Network Paradigm: New Directions in Strategic Communication Research

Sponsored Sessions

Chairs

Aimei Yang, U of Southern California, USA

Adam J. Saffer, U of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, USA

Across the social sciences, scholars are increasingly applying a network perspective to examine a range of phenomena. A network perspective reasons that relationships are the basic building blocks of societies and it helps us to answer questions about the connections among individuals, groups, organizations, as well as nonhuman actors. Contemporary communication and media systems have amplified the significance of networks (van Dijk, 2006) and have led scholars to theorize how and why networks at the micro, meso and macro levels influence the processes of production, experience, power, and culture (Castells, 2009).

Despite the growing interest in data and society, relatively little attention has been paid to the implications of a data society for the forms and dynamics of publics and public communication. If the institution of the modern public sphere has always aspired to a degree of autonomy vis-a-vis its critical targets, what happens when its targets they government or business entities begin to actively incite the production of public discourse and then harvest it as data for profit or surveillance? Does the advent of a data society lead to a new structural transformation of the public sphere? This preconference invites scholars to rethink the meaning and practices of publics and public communication in this new data society. Possible paper topics may include, but are not limited to, the following: transparency of public data privacy of personal data data activism data and governance data and surveillance algorithms and publics algorithms in journalism data as discursive formation data journalism and publics data visualization and public communication big data and deceptions in politics data and the global public sphere.

Natacha Yazbeck, U of Pennsylvania, USA

The format of this day-long colloquium follows that of previous years, including San Diego in 2017 and Fukuoka in 2016. Students will break into two groups, based on the focus of their research, and will each present work that has been submitted beforehand to a senior scholar, with whom they have been matched. The reviewer will then provide feedback and open the floor for questions from attendees. Students will then convene in one room for the closing session, a panel session featuring established researchers that will ideally be tailored to participant's research or publishing needs. This format was met with overwhelmingly positive reviews from student attendees in both San Diego and Fukuoka.

By bringing together for the first-time scholars engaged in applying the capabilities approach to media and communications, this ICA preconference advances an agenda to create a new interdisciplinary focus in the field. It aims to build conceptual bridges across emerging frameworks for studying communicative capabilities, media practice, and digital literacies and to engage with normative debates about media justice, creative justice and data justice. The preconference directly engages with the central theme of the ICA Annual Conference on "Voices" by inviting reflection on the ways we can address inequalities and enhance communicative opportunities for media workers and users in a global context.

 Christoph Klimmt, Hannover U of Music, Drama, and Media, GERMANY

Narratives have been attracting the interest of scholars in various fields of communication. While much research effort has been dedicated to short-term effects, substantially less is known about long-term effects of narrative forms of communication. This preconference will shed light on this understudied aspect and (1) discuss theoretical approaches to long-term effects of narrative communication, (2) reflect on capabilities of narratives to involve audiences and (3) present current empirical research on long-term effects.

This preconference marks the anniversary of 'the participatory turn': a decade ago, there was widespread optimism about the creative, economic and democratic potential of audience participation in the media. The preconference explores how participation as a concept, strategy and practice has developed over the last decade, and engages in a dialogue concerning how 'the participatory turn' has led not only to increased engagement from audiences, but also to participatory fatigue, disengagement and resistance. Keynote speaker is Mark Deuze, author of 'Media Life' (2014). The preconference includes presentations from participants and a panel discussion.

Voices have the capacity to take on many different forms. To start, research questions aimed at examining voices provide an entry point into addressing societal and philosophical issues. Scholarly conferences and the implications of visuals in association with voices are a necessity within the halls of academia and the practice of contemporary research. This preconference attempts to encompass all the definitions of voices and particularly how these voices are visually represented or not, in the still-growing field of visual communication. We bring together a critical mass of young and senior scholars to discuss, reflect and challenge each other on the complexity of voices as a concept and its relationship to the world of visual communication.

In this preconference, we will scrutinize the persistent and emergent intersections between media and human rights in relation to sociocultural, political and economic dynamics. The objective is to contribute to knowledge and debates on the crucial ties between human rights and the media in a globalizing and digitizing world. Both the challenges and opportunities (e.g., mediated humanitarian intervention vis-à-vis the question of desensitization of audiences to suffering) presented by such macro dynamics are considered.

Games are relocating themselves from “traditional” locations toward formerly exclusive private (e.g., bedroom, bathroom) and public spots (e.g., public transportation, classrooms). This emergence of additional gaming contexts goes hand-in-hand with technological innovation resulting in novel experiences for both players and their surroundings. This preconference focuses on gaming beyond the prototypical desktop and TV to explore evolving player demographics, new gaming practices, and psychological consequences arising from the near-ubiquity of games in everyday life.

Media are gendered and sexualized while gender and sexuality are heavily mediated. At this preconference, we will examine the intersections between media, gender and sexuality from a European perspective, particularly from the perspective of underrepresented contexts such as Central, Eastern and Southern Europe. How do European contexts matter for those intersections? How are those intersections manifested in Europe? What are the legacies and the futures of European gender, feminist, sexuality and LGBTQ media studies?

In concert with the ICA conference theme of "Voices," our pre-conference focuses on the communication processed reshaped by digital technology and data. We want to focus on the theme whether digital media bring us more voices or divide us into different segmented society? We invite scholars from across ICA's divisions to discuss their work related to data and communication from various epistemological and methodological backgrounds. We welcome discussions at the individual, group, organizational and societal levels.

PRECONFERENCE: Crowdsourcing as a Content Analysis Tool: Presentations and a Hands-On Workshop

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Lei Guo, Boston U, USA

Respondents

Margrit Betke, Boston U, USA
Hajo G. Boomgaarden, U of Vienna, AUSTRIA
Kate Mays, Boston U, USA

The preconference will introduce the emerging content analysis method "crowdcoding" to communication researchers through research presentations and a hands-on workshop. Instead of relying on a few human coders to conduct analysis, this approach outsources "coding" tasks to numerous people online and applies an aggregation policy to make decisions. The method is popular in computer science and has just begun to attract scholarly attention in social science.

Online communication and audience analytics go hand-in-hand these days. Analytical software packages such as Chartbeat and Parse.ly offer live observational data about website visitors, their preferences, and their usage behaviors. In light of this flood of information, one might expect audience analytics to influence communicators. This preconference aims to unite researchers from multiple countries to report and discuss potential influences and outcomes at the intersection of online communication and audience analytics.

Sponsored Sessions

Respondents

Stine Eckert, Wayne State U, USA
Diana Iulia Nastasia, Southern Illinois U Edwardsville, USA
Lana F. Rakow, U of North Dakota, USA

The session will take up the issue of feminist communication theories, their scope and reach in a globalized world. After discussions about feminist theory in communication peaked over a decade ago, the subject has not received sustained current attention, despite significant work and critiques by transnational feminists. While important feminist work still is being conducted across speech, rhetoric, journalism, mass communication and digital technologies, it is time to take stock.

Participants

Philip N. Howard, Oxford Internet Institute, U of Oxford, UNITED KINGDOM

Guobin Yang, U of Pennsylvania, USA

Sheila Coronel, Columbia U, USA

Peter Baumgartner, Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, CZECH REPUBLIC

From dyadic, face-to-face interactions to blogs and Twitter feeds, the expression of voice has long played a central role in our social and political lives. Studies of voice – its normative underpinnings, its manifestations, and its micro- and macro-level effects – illuminate how our lives have been impacted and how our scholarship has evolved. More important, the landscape continues to evolve and compelling questions remain before us. This year's opening plenary features four experts whose presentations paint an arc of significant theoretical, technological, political and social change vis-à-vis voice. Guobin Yang (U of Pennsylvania) analyzes the transformation of New Left radicalism in the U.S. and China and shows how a fascination with abstract theoretical concepts can harm practical struggles for social justice. Peter Baumgartner (Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty) examines evolving expressions of voice, particularly in Russia and Eastern Europe. Sheila Coronel (Columbia U) focuses on technology and voice, juxtaposing the power of the early web to break the monopoly of information against the current use of social media for disinformation and harassment purposes. Philip Howard (U of Oxford) closes by presenting five design principles that allow for building civic engagement and voice into the internet of things.

Kurdish media and communications have generally been studied in terms of national identity construction, expression of dissent and political mobilization. This panel intervenes in this paradigm and brings space, place and materiality back into the analysis. Focusing on Kurdish cinema, news media and digital communications, the panelists analyze imagined and lived experiences of space and place, hegemonic struggles over public spaces of exhibition, and colonization (and decolonization) of infrastructures, networks and hardware.

This workshop will facilitate a discussion of how religion can be addressed within media and communication scholarship. Religion persists in social, cultural, and political spheres in the 21st century; it is argued media and processes of mediation largely account for this persistence. While fields that constitute contemporary religion, scholarship have begun to take media seriously, and a separate vibrant discourse around “media and religion” research has also emerged, religion remains a lacuna in media studies. This workshop, featuring voices from the fields of media studies and religious studies, will provide an opportunity for scholars to consider the challenge religion poses to established conceptual, theoretical, and methodological approaches within our field.

While media literacy can empower youth and children to develop their agency, it has challenges in raising the voices of marginalized groups. Many studies showcase how critical pedagogy using media education empower children and youth, but little have questioned the affordances with communities whose voices are silenced. This international panel aims to bring six case studies to showcase the challenges and affordances of media literacy practices with marginalized groups.

Blue Sky Workshop: Teaching Skills and Social Justice: Learning Communication, Writing, and Journalism Skills and Diversity

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Adina Schneeweis, Oakland U, USA

Chiaoning Su, Oakland U, USA

Much of existing communication, writing and journalism curriculum is organized around skills, with a nod to diversity relegated to at most one class period or week typically, the week on ethics. What is at stake is perpetuating a culture of communicators and writers who do not understand their audiences fully, do not address their readers' needs fully, risk overlooking key elements of our changing society, risk perpetuating stereotypes, absences, and silences, and most broadly continue to hurt and oppress through words and ignorance. Engaging feedback from those in attendance, the session offers questions and resources to help teachers dig deeper into issues of diversity and include high-impact activities in skills courses.

Friedrich Lothar Krotz, U of Bremen, GERMANY

The panel will focus on the theme of the 2018 conference of the International Association for Media and Communication Research (IAMCR): "Reimagining Sustainability: Communication and Media in a Changing World." There is an immediate need to promote responsible and sustainable management of natural resources and ecosystems that incorporate local and global reflection and action. This inevitably raises urgent issues of entrenched power, social justice, democracy, and the need to eradicate poverty, raise basic living standards, and address the present climate crisis. This ambition is currently under attack. In spite of overwhelming scientific evidence, climate change denial is used to build public support for unsustainable environmental practices and policies while corporate greenwashing promotes the perception that these practices and policies are in fact environmentally friendly. Encouraged by the rise of populism and ever-smaller media bubbles, intolerance is on the upswing around the world. Inequality is outpacing economic growth. Wealth is ever more concentrated. We find it imperative in these times that we sour understanding of current and emerging models of sustainability, the struggles that surround them, and their multiple relationships with communication and media. The panel will address these intersections by revising and remixing theories, practices and institutions that move beyond merely sustaining—towards thriving societies and cultures.

Our workshop focuses on four questions to explore the impacts of this accessibility: 1) has the style of discourse and rhetoric of political actors changed due to their use of digital tools? 2) has the nature of discourse changed due to open access to mass communication tools? 3) how do digital tools allow us to analyse and understand emerging patterns of discourse and rhetoric 4) can trends in citizen discourse online inform us about broader societal attitudes?

 David Hesmondhalgh, U of Leeds, UNITED KINGDOM

This panel brings together researchers who have researched the relationships between social class and media. The aim is to highlight a range of theories and methods that are currently being brought to bear on these relationships and bring them into dialogue with each other. The methods include content analysis, textual analysis, historical analysis and the various methods of media production analysis. Theoretical concepts include voice, intersectionality, ideology critique, platform capitalism, political economy and field theory.

Blue Sky Workshop: Exploring Approaches to Crisis Communication

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Sky Marsen, Flinders U, AUSTRALIA

This workshop invites discussion on the different methods used in examining organizational crisis communication and crisis management. Although crisis communication is generally classified as a public relations subject, its themes encompass issues in applied linguistics (discourse analysis), management, technical writing (instructing information, checklists), and media theory, among other disciplines. In this respect, it is an interdisciplinary subject, but little interaction exists among different methodologies. The workshop aims to classify and compare major approaches, in order to identify common concerns and possibilities for collaboration among qualitative, quantitative and discourse researchers. Questions explored include: What is lacking in crisis communication research? What are some useful new eclectic approaches that could produce interesting insights?

Against Exceptionalism: Rethinking Development in Global Health Communication

Shaunak Sastry, U of Cincinnati, USA

Ambar Basu, U of South Florida, USA

In the backdrop of increasing global inequalities, the consolidation of wealth in the hands of the global elite, and the erasure of platforms for participation of the margins in democratic processes, a critique of development communication offers an entry point for theorizing, measuring, implementing and evaluating communication for global social change that emerges "from" and "with" voices at the margins. This panel of papers critically interrogates the fundamental notions of what counts as development, re-turning the discursive sites of articulating development into the hands of communities at the margins. Listening to voices from the margins offers an opening to understand and document processes and outcomes of organizing against and resistance to the neoliberal order that proselytizes deindustrialization, digitization, surveillance, philanthropy, and exceptionalism. The voices of the margins, recognized and re-presented in local-regional-national discursive spaces, interrogate the received meanings of development and social change, producing knowledge that decolonizes the dominant articulations of development. Further, this offers a conceptual map and an epistemological grammar for disrupting the erasures that are built into traditional models of development, simultaneously centering alternative rationalities for organizing societies and relationships in local-global discursive spaces. This five-paper panel brings together research from several subdisciplines in communication – public relations, health communication, organizational communication, cultural studies, and development communication. Panelists come from communication studies departments from across the globe and draw on their field studies with different communities in the global South. The papers present a range of research in communication, from theoretical ideas of development, voice, and digital subalternity, to organizing resistance against development, to field work-based narratives on deindustrialization in China, on HIV and sex work and HIV and truck drivers, both, in India.

The ability to turn vast amounts of activity and human behaviour into data points that can be tracked and profiled has led to significant changes across government, business and civil society. With the emergence of this data paradigm comes a new set of power dynamics requiring investigation and critique. This panel intervenes in this debate by looking at the implications of datafication for interlocking systems of social, economic, and racial injustice, exploring questions of technology, design, policy and activism.

It has been 18 years since the important defining article on Information Systems Division was published in Communication Yearbook (Shapiro, Hamilton, Lang, and Contractor, 2000). The leading senior and junior members of the division will discuss how the identity of the division evolved over the last 20 years. In addition, we will consider how our division compares to other divisions of ICA. Do the changes within the division reflect changes in the field in general? What are some evolving trends within the division? What are the opportunities, challenges, and future directions for our division? All members are invited to join our conversation at the round table and continuously after the meeting.

To create more effective media for children in the Global South, formative and summative research is being conducted. Panelists will describe recent work done in Tanzania, India, Rwanda, and Haiti. In these low- and middle-income countries (LMICs), researchers are studying audiences and working with experts to guide and enhance message development and dissemination. Others use diverse methodological approaches to examine if and how exposure to various programs impact young children's early learning outcomes.

The digital era led to changes in our fields of research to the extent that a new category emerged: digital studies which emphasized the use of quantitative methods as well. Therefore, in lieu of a sometimes rather binary opposition between using quantitative methods and qualitative methods, the French Society of Communication and Information Sciences intends to question the value of interdisciplinarity and consciousness of complex issues to anchor a necessary methodological pluralism in communication research.

Talk to any CAM scholar, and they will likely tell you that when it comes to understanding the relationship between young people and the media, context matters. In particular, scholars often note the critical role that caregivers (in particular, parents and teachers) play in this relationship. In this panel, scholars will present their newest work on the caregiver context highlighting, for example, the role of parental mediation in the digital and political spheres and how teachers are reappropriating the digital space to provide support to youth. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

The world changes fast, the world of media and communication even faster. This forces researchers to adjust and to reflect on the important questions we need to ask. At the same time we have more data and better tools than ever before to study the world of media and politics. In this panel 6 distinguished and inspiring scholars discuss some of the big questions for political communication research. They address issues that have not received enough attention or need a different approach because of rapid digitalization. Each presentation will be short leaving ample time for public discussion.

This panel will explore visual “voice” in corporate, diplomatic, and media efforts to build understanding and strategic relationships in global intercultural contexts. Panelists will share insights gleaned from their research into visual ethics, visual public diplomacy, global tourism images, visual communication for international trade, and visual strategies in global CSR and sustainability communication. While the overarching goal will be to critically analyze the presentation and function of visual discourse in intercultural exchanges, contexts include still and moving images in various digital media initiated by businesses, governments, and news organizations. Theoretical perspectives and methodologies include visual rhetoric, frame analysis, agenda setting, persuasion, cultural dimensions, and semiotics.

This panel unpacks the complexities of voice in institutional journalism and reflects on the challenges voice poses to the digital public sphere. The panel goes beyond controversies that either celebrate voice as a promise of media democratization or lament voice for accentuating political echo-chambers. It applies a multi-perspectival lens on three key challenges that voice poses to journalism: epistemological (how multi-voicedness shapes news), political (how it shapes public judgment) and ethical (how it shapes relationships to others).

Communication interventions that are successful in initial tests can nevertheless fail to be effective when implemented on larger scales in real-world contexts. Our goal in this panel is to bring together communication researchers interested in translating basic research into interventions with others with expertise on scaling interventions. Speakers will articulate the current state of the field and highlight gaps worthy of future research.

The panelists discuss how they deploy the concept in their work, both in the context of recent political dislocations and in light of different discourses that question the coherence of the concept. The papers reflect on neoliberalism’s place as a privileged object of critical analysis in communication research.

Today's young people are tomorrow's leaders. And, for many of these young people, their first experiences with news, civics, or political consciousness occurs through a mediated (often digital) space. What do these experiences look like? What do they learn? How do their experiences translate into the offline world? These are the types of questions that scholars in this panel are trying to understand. With no easy answers, this panel promises to get you thinking and reflecting on how media can assist (or not) in raising civically-minded youth. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

This panel explores the emerging field of transnational journalism history to open up a fresh approach to study the historical transformation of journalism. It theoretically outlines how and why journalism history should move forward from primarily national reference frames to a transnational paradigm. Building upon this theoretical fundament, papers based on empirical case studies analyse the transfer of norms, practices and textual conventions and their consecutive adaptation in national contexts.

Cities have voices. Cities speak in many ways. The Urban Communication Foundation works to place communication in the foreground of concerns for the city. The communicative city was developed as a construct to measure and recognize urban municipalities that provide or facilitate the creation and maintenance of a healthy communicative environment. Cities not only support human communication but are living organisms that speak themselves. The communicative city initiative espouses the axiom that a community is shaped by communication. A city is a site for communication and an artifact of communication. This panel lends an urban communication perspective to the examination of voices, spotlighting the voices of the host city of Prague. Prague offers lessons in traditional voices of architecture and urban street life while meeting challenges of a changing global media landscape. This panel brings together urban communication scholars and representatives of the Prague community to discuss issues of tourism, its impact on residents and communities, and social enterprises that focus on city tours from a homeless perspective.

Social media fragments communicative circles and media engagement; self-proclaimed and anointed “influencers” wield authority over micro-communities; and journalists, advertisers, and content creators embark on a quest for novelty. As these conditions normalise, the idea of “subcultures” ironically seems at once theoretically naïve, yet self-evident. Framed by the rise of social media and hipster capitalism, this panel updates and challenges the notion of subculture, and probes its relationship to social media and cultural economy.

The global dimension of the internet is currently in tension with rising ambitions from various actors to drastically reclaim the control over their storage and circulation capacities, e.g. with VPN ban, data localisation laws, lock-in strategies, or DRM. This panel creates a dialogue between the critical investigation of the multiple layers of this assemblage of control—infrastructure, platform, code, data, and content—to understand how these power relations shape the future of the internet.

Some suspect that personalization algorithms create filter bubbles or echo chambers that distort communication and undermine democracy. Using data from the Quello Search Project, which conducted surveys of six European nations and the United States, we argue that most people receive political information from multiple media and they frequently encounter contradictory opinions. Media policy has not considered the implications of personalization; we consider what policy changes are warranted.

Fair use—the limited right in the U.S., Israel and a few other jurisdictions to use unlicensed copyrighted material—should enable communications scholarship in a digital era. Remix, big data research, multimedia publishing, software studies and more all depend on it. But are ICA members using their rights? Are they teaching their students their rights? Is it even clear to us how fair use works for our community? ICA's 2009 Code of Best Practices in Fair Use for Communication Scholarship (on the ICA website) has promoted awareness, but many scholars remain unsure about how to use it, publishers sometimes balk, and many other countries lack equivalent exceptions for scholars. This session opens up a long-awaited discussion of roadblocks to employing fair use, what ICA is doing to overcome them for our field, and what we should be doing. This knowledge-sharing session will educate scholars new to fair use, boost skills in negotiating with publishers, and offer a platform for success stories. The conversation will culminate in a list of suggestions for ICA actions to increase the accessibility of copyright exceptions for communication scholars.

This panel explores intersections of ethnicity and sexuality in a migration context, focusing on the experiences and representations of LGBTQ migrants in Europe. Drawing on queer migration theory as well as original empirical research, the papers discuss how LGBTQ migrants are represented in mass media and how they present themselves, using social and other media to connect and network. The papers also address issues of sexual nationalism, simplistically opposing the LGBTQ-friendly West to homophobia elsewhere.

The panel unites scholars from CEE countries who discuss network citizenship practices of the last electoral cycle. The cases presented are Russia, Belarus, Hungary, and Poland, where, recently, anti-liberal forces have dominated the main political arenas. In these circumstances, the issues of information diversity arise, and possibilities for voicing dissent diminish. But even if free and full-fledged, oppositional communication leaves a question of whether it adds to plausible pluralism or further social polarization.

For most tweens and teens, media is part of their daily life experience. And, perhaps for this reason, scholars are increasingly asking about the opportunities and consequences of this media use. In particular, scholars question the role this media use plays in health. These questions often share interesting theoretical overlap, and together, highlight the very real influence of media on the health of t(w)eens today. To feature this work, this session will be presented as a Hybrid High Density (HHD) session. Presenters are asked to give a brief (3 minute) “teaser” or “pitch” of their work. This teaser does not cover the entirety of the paper but instead highlights the key questions that the work answers. Then, after all presenters deliver their pitch, the session changes to a “poster” (see note) session whereby presenters can more deeply present their work to small groups or in one-to-one discussions with audience members. Please note: due to space limitations, ICA will be implementing a new digital “poster” format for HHD sessions whereby presenters are invited to present an abbreviated poster, slides, or infographic on their personal laptop/touchscreen device, or to provide hand-outs to attendees. Posters affixed to an upright wall or structure will not be permitted.

This panel will explore filter bubbles as social mechanisms that prevent the public from finding diverse information on potentially important issues. To date, empirical research has not been able to offer a clear understanding on the existence and impact of filter bubbles. In an attempt to address this void, each of the panel presenters will present empirical analyses on the topic, along with discussion on the operationalization of the concept of filter bubbles.

Measures of Knowledge Gain and Comprehension in Experimental Research

Maria Elizabeth Grabe, Indiana U, USA

In the late 1980s Doris Graber described mono-modal studies as dubious, producing distortions in understanding media, and bound for wholesale questioning. Over the past three decades her call for multimodal inquiry has gained growing recognition. It seems obvious that multimodal media content and influences are best understood when both the verbal and visual modalities are considered in research designs. Historically though, scholars have either stubbornly overlooked the visual component of audiovisual media or, perhaps in response to the shortfall in visual inquiry, focused solely on images and ignored words. The goal with the proposed panel is to take steps toward transcending this fissure in scholarship. The participants of this panel are committed to uncoiling the past and joining interdisciplinary efforts to tackle new challenges in multimodal research presented by emerging media formats and user interactions. Each panelist will offer pragmatic insights, gained from their own work, to advance (or provoke) debate about future attempts at work in the same vein. This spans phases of the research process (theory/conceptual work, operationalization of constructs, methods and measures); evidence-gathering approaches (content and textual analyses, experiments, ethnography); and theoretical orientation (framing, information processing, semiotics, knowledge gap). Our intent is to advance interest in multimodal research, share potential solutions to common impediments in doing this type of work, and perhaps form an informal international coalition of scholars who can council each other in future work.

Blue Sky Workshop: Amplifying Voices: Using the Ethnography of Communication to Explore and Advance Social Justice

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Tabitha Hart, San Jose State U, USA

The ethnography of communication (EC) is an interpretive theoretical-methodological framework. Social justice is the fair distribution of wealth, opportunities and other privileges across all members of a society. This workshop will explore the use of EC for social justice oriented research and practice. Together we will pool our expertise and our ideas to creatively investigate the types of EC-based or EC-inspired research we could carry out in service social justice goals. At the end of this workshop, participants will leave with ideas and a collaboratively produced “starter kit” for using EC for social justice oriented research, practice and teaching. This workshop is open to all. No special preparation or prerequisites are needed to participate.

This panel examines the ways local journalists respond to major changes affecting their field, from digitization to shrinking newsrooms to ownership shifts. In particular, the featured scholars will describe innovative ways journalists at both local and regional news organizations have remained connected with the voices of their audiences and the needs of their communities despite significant transformations affecting how local news is produced. The panelists’ projects also represent different countries and media systems to offer a comparative dimension to their work and reveal commonalities across diverse news contexts.

This panel focuses on mechanisms, processes and platforms through which marginalized groups, embedded in asymmetric intergroup relationships, express their identities, narratives and agendas in the arena of intergroup communication. We discuss different and diverse socio-political settings that are characterized by asymmetry of power and by conflicting narratives and agendas, and by marginalization of groups and voices.

Meanings of migration and in particular recent refugee movements have become shaped by the discourses on various online spaces. Social media notably become key avenues for meaning construction. This panel approaches (online) media representations of migration from multiple epistemological and methodological viewpoints, not only looking at the 'content' of representations but also at its production processes and reception among different societal actors (including those who are being represented).

How and with what consequences do political executives and media interact? This question is at the centre of the forthcoming edited volume Close and Distant: Political Executive-Media Relations in Four Countries. These national cases are Finland, Lithuania, Poland and Sweden. The case studies build mainly on extensive interviews with political journalists and government media/political advisors, supplemented by documentary evidence. This panel presents five cross-national themes of the volume: government communication; social media; formality and informality; mediatization of politics; and political communication culture. In the thematic chapters, individual countries are used as comparative cases or case illustrations.

The presentation will show how the turbulent times of the Vienna of Lazarsfeld early years played a crucial part in shaping Lazarsfeld's intellectual development, and his later life in America. The presentation moves away from an intellectual history as such to offer a political and social framing of the history of communication research.

Blue Sky Workshop: Working on a Contentious Topic: Toward a Guideline on Best Practices in Race-Related Communication ResearchSponsored Sessions*Chair

David Schieferdecker, Freie U Berlin, GERMANY

Race has recently been at the center of public debates on systemic racism, the surge of right-wing populism, and mounting challenges posed by global migration. While empirical, race-related communication scholarship is pivotal to understand the role of race in social interactions, media reception and media discourse, it faces unique challenges. Due to the emotive and controversial nature of race, insensitive approaches risk causing harm to participants, might compromise data quality and can perpetuate stereotypes. Despite this, a list of best practices and “Dos and Don’ts” that could guide researchers and graduate students new to the field is lacking. The workshop aims to bring together qualitative and quantitative scholars from multiple ICA divisions to produce a first version of such guidelines.

This panel explores the issue of voice in the mediation of the ‘refugee crisis’ in Europe, considering power relations and dichotomies in global communicative spaces. Through large scale content analyses of press and ethnographies of local communication, we investigate voice as a site of struggle between dominant and alternative accounts. The panel examines how the quality of voice in the media informs public debates on citizenship and how struggles over voice entail counter-accounts of belonging.

This panel unites international perspectives from various European Union countries on the interwoven responsibilities for and reactions to ongoing societal and political developments in the EU. The authors shed light on the relationship between (political) elites, the media, and citizens from different methodological points of view. As a whole, the panel helps in providing a better understanding of what drives Eurosceptic attitudes and resulting political changes all over Europe.

Trends. What are the leading trends of today in the CAM space? How are young people spending their time? How much time is allocated to different media types? What role might individual differences or cultural differences play in this process? And what about the context surrounding media use? What do the data tell us? In this panel, scholars will attempt to answer these and other questions by presenting some of the newest trends in the CAM field. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

Fifty years ago, supporters of decolonization and civil rights rose to challenge the political status quo in Europe and United States. Now, the voices of white nationalism and anti-immigrant populism are ascendant. Four media historians look to the past to help understand our troubling present. They examine public discourse from four perspectives across the twentieth century and consider how earlier debates over race and citizenship shaped public memory and influenced the current political climate.

This theory-practice roundtable, with authors of Mediated Construction of Reality (Couldry and Hepp, 2017) and four engaged scholars, aims to illuminate authors' materialist phenomenological-based theorizing project and media activism. Following overviews of - book by authors and discussants' community-based projects, session's facilitated dialogue will discuss agency, knowledge distribution, collectivities' potentialities for engaging complex problems (e.g. poverty, police-community relations, fate of rivers and their communities) through grassroots media production amidst the 'deep mediatization' of mediated reality.

Creeping authoritarianism is becoming a feature in countries and regions presumed to be among the most open and democratic. While journalists have long faced intimidation, threats, and even violence in many parts of the world, what happens when journalistic risk becomes a salient concern even in places otherwise thought of as bastions of free expression? Panelists consider this question by conceptualizing journalistic risk, challenging conventional wisdom about journalism and democracy, and drawing comparisons from authoritarian practices in various parts of the world.

New Media, New Work, and the New Call to Intimacy: The Case of Musicians (Steve Jones Internet Lecture)

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Nancy Baym, Microsoft Research, USA

Respondent

Steven Jones, U of Illinois-Chicago, USA

The architectures and norms of new media push people toward sharing everyday intimacies they might historically have kept to close friends and family. As more people are pushed toward gig work, the original gig workers—musicians—provide an exemplary lens for exploring the implications of this widespread blurring of interpersonal communication into everyday practices of professional viability. This talk draws on nearly a decade of work to show how the pressure to be “authentic” in communicating with audiences, combined with the designs and materialities of new communication technologies, raises dialectic tensions that musicians, and many others, must manage as social media platforms become integral to professional life.

Sites/Sights of Sovereignty: Indigenous Media Projects in Hawaii and the Pacific Islands Jennifer Gauthier, Randolph College, USA

This panel draws together innovative, current work in the study of indigenous and first nations communication, from the Americas to Australia. The papers start from a commitment to hearing indigenous voice in terms of indigenous knowledge systems or epistemologies and to record the expression of self-determination and social justice in indigenous media, art and politics. In doing so, what can be termed “positive narratives” of land and memory or rich communicative resources for communication are foregrounded as tools to understand indigenous voice and the use by indigenous communicators of a range of media platforms. Indigenous voice emerges here as assertive at the community level, politically and diplomatically enabled and engaged in sometimes transnational coalitions. At the same time, the papers explore the tensions in the appropriation of nonindigenous platforms and the stark difference between voice being audible and being paid attention to. A key challenge for engaged research on indigenous voice is to highlight what communicative strategies are truly productive for social justice goals.

Saturday
14:00-15:15
Hilton Prague Old

Strauss

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Colleen Packer Berg, Weber State U, USA

This workshop brings together the Seven Principles of Good Practice in Undergraduate Education (Chickering & Gamson, 1991) with Dweck (2016) growth mindset research, small teaching (Lang, 2016) and evidence-based teaching strategies (Major, Harris & Zakrajsek, 2016) to assist faculty in cultivating a learning mindset with their students. Participants will receive a handout of the “Seven Principles and Principles for Learning” to focus and guide discussion. In small groups, participants will share examples of how they apply the principles in the development and instruction of their courses, including online, hybrid and face-to-face contexts. It is hoped that participants will come away with numerous evidence-based teaching strategies and assignments that focus on cultivating a learning mindset and enhancing student success.

Dancing in Prague: The 5th Annual ICA Dance Party

Sponsored Sessions

Join colleagues and friends old and new to blow off some steam, celebrate the halfway point of the conference, and stretch your muscles after a long day of sitting in sessions! A cash (ticket) bar and a locally renowned DJ help create the mood with danceable hits from the 70s, 80s, 90s and current Top 40 hits from multiple genres. Created by then-President Peter Vorderer in Seattle, this has become a perennial favorite of ICA attendees!

Start your morning off right with a 45 minute, all-levels, Hatha Yoga practice at the Hilton Prague's Summer Terrace (mezzanine level, weather permitting) at 7am (Friday – Sunday) and hop right into your first session with a calm mind and relaxed body. The practice will be light, no shower needed. Bring a mat or large towel and wear some comfortable pants. Treat yourself and combat the long day of sitting and standing with this gentle yoga practice brought to you by ICA member Sophie Janicke-Bowles, certified yoga teacher by night (RYT200, Yogalution, Long Beach, 2016), Assistant Professor by day, who volunteered her time to share her practice with Prague attendees. Thank you, Sophie! Note: Sophie will tweet with the hashtag #ica18yoga if class is canceled due to inclement weather conditions.

Against the backdrop of international turmoil, the study of the “friendly, “peaceful” voice in global communication has never been more relevant. In this panel we suggest a multidisciplinary perspective on the central challenge of our time: how to foster amicable relations between states through communication? Examining the concept of the friendly voice in communication, language and international studies, the panel aims to identify the building blocks and logics of amicable communication and their peaceful consequences.

The spectre of populism that has emerged in Europe in the aftermath of the global 2008 economic crisis in Europe has not only revealed the structural and institutional weaknesses of political economies in Europe but also put democratic regimes among both “established democracies” of Western Europe and “consolidating democracies” of Central and Eastern Europe into question as a highly fertile ground for populist discourses and receptive audiences have been created. Whilst the conditions for the advancement of populism are diverse, and often grounded in the particularities of political regimes, broadcast media and digital media technologies should be at the centre of the study of ideological, cultural, and economic factors underpinning the dissemination of populist discourses in European politics. There is a consensus among scholars that media actors and political actors co-produce a media landscape for the consumption of user-friendly political news, thus overcoming the tensions between the logics of media and politics. Populist discourses, therefore, should be considered as the result of the flow of direct, indirect, and mixed interactions between political and media actors.

Blue Sky Workshop: Algorithmic Accountability: Mapping Out Common Concerns

Sunday

 Hilton Prague Old

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Daniel Angus, U of Queensland, AUSTRALIA

Algorithmic sorting and decision-making is fundamentally transforming the nature of media and commercial transactions. Recent research indicates, for example, that online retailer Amazon curates its search page to steer consumers toward products sold by companies who have paid them for services, even if those products are not the best deal for consumers. Algorithms shape what consumers see in their news feeds on social media, and how advertising and search results are displayed to them. In some cases, it determines what prices they pay for products online, and algorithms decide what music to play for them and what movies to recommend to them on streaming services. In many cases, these algorithms represent a useful and convenient way to navigate the contemporary information environment. At the same time, algorithms can introduce forms of discrimination and bias that are invisible to consumers. They can shape the information, products, and services to which they are exposed according to goals and priorities that may not be their own. We have embarked on a data driven economy in which these decision-making processes are likely to become both more prevalent and more opaque. Protecting consumers means finding ways to hold algorithms accountable and to provide forms of transparency that ensure consumer confidence and ensure that harmful forms of discrimination can be detected and avoided. More information about consumer preferences and a clearer overview of the fast-changing digital landscape have a crucial role to play in developing these protections.

Teaching intercultural communication, grounded in critical approaches to differences, can be difficult, challenging, and daunting for instructors. The students may resist acknowledging historical and contemporary power relations that constitute the hierarchy of differences in and across local, national, and global contexts. To examine such uneasiness and complexities, the presenters highlight the notion of voice as a critical concept to further theorize the complexity, multiplicity, and fluidity of intercultural communication pedagogy in this panel.

CAM scholars frequently acknowledge the importance of the parent in the child-media experience, but more often than not, this is considered as a moderator in relationships. It is far less often that we hear the parent's voice about this child-media experience. In line with the conference theme, "voices", in this panel, scholars will challenge audience members to consider the role of the parent's voice across a range of examples—from media preferences to media effects to how they approach media as a parent. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

This panel examines the many ways voices are heard and go unheard in large-scale social media platform ecosystems. We examine classic themes of erasure, omission, and representation in platform contexts of affordances and scale in order to understand contemporary hierarchies of attention. Each paper foregrounds a different theoretical and methodological dimension of why, by whom, and how voices are heard (or not) within large social media platforms.

The Blue Sky Workshop Advertising and Public Relations: Together or Apart? Voices from academia and the industry will provide an interactive platform for discussion among academics and practitioners on one of the most pressing topics in today's industry: whether public relations and advertising are the two fields and areas of study that are moving toward an inevitable merger with each other or whether these two fields still embrace separate, distinguished areas of research and practice. The workshop will include educators and practitioners from the five parts of the world: Europe, Asia, North and South Americas, Australia, and Africa. The discussion at this Blue Sky Workshop will contribute to producing the 2018 Prague Manifesto: Global Voices on Advertising and Public Relations.

This panel focuses on gender as a generative force that underlies a plurality of voices speaking for/about China in diverse arenas. Using critical and feminist perspectives, the panel highlights the gendered manner in which China and its citizen-subjects are situated within unequal speaking positions produced by local and global power relations. The panel provides new insights into the implications of these gendered processes and practices for larger societal and global transformations.

Typically, in the CAM space, researchers immediately think of the opportunities of educational media to support academic skills in youngsters. These are important and very real questions. But lessons learned go beyond this in powerful and important ways. As the authors in this panel show, media can play a role in one's moral development, can influence emotional development and connectedness, can provide inspiration for future careers, and can serve as a means of bridging community memories. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

Many professors in our field of communication and technology participate in some form of entrepreneurship, but this aspect of our careers is rarely discussed in our scholarly circles. This panel will shed light on a broad array of entrepreneurship practices from professors who have not only produced leading scholarship in the field, but have also started their own venture capital-funded companies and cultivated relationships with multi-billion dollar corporations (e.g., Amazon, Samsung). Although we often discuss academia and industry as mutually exclusive career paths, these scholars have straddled the boundary and developed complementary activities and identities in both areas. This panel will help junior scholars and graduate students understand the major risks and benefits of pursuing such a path. There are multiple opportunities for entrepreneurship at the university/industry intersection: founder, CEO, consultant, scientific advisor, university affiliate programs, teaching entrepreneurship, corporate boards, and more. Each of these roles falls in a different location along a continuum of risk, rewards, and potential traps. For example, compared to starting your own company, consulting (albeit loosely entrepreneurial) is far less risky, with more flexible time requirements and fewer start-up costs, but also smaller potential rewards. This panel will elucidate this continuum, drawing from the panelists success and horror stories. Professor entrepreneurs should also consider the boundary between university and industry with respect to ideas about communication. There are cultural elements to consider when negotiating with the school about how to navigate your roles in both academia and industry. The panelists have experience with a range of agreements in this regard, from dedicating a few hours per week to entrepreneurship to taking full-time leave away from academia for a few years to work with a corporation. The panelists will share and reflect on these experiences. Last, if you decide to extend or leverage some form of intellectual capital or service into your own company, you must also consider operational and strategic factors related to fundraising, licensing, and much more. If the panelists have not scared the audience away with their horror stories by this point, they will share their best advice about how to navigate this gauntlet of investors, lawyers and partners.

Blue Sky Workshop: New Research Strategies for Studying Children and the Internet of Things (IoT)

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Tijana Milosevic, U of Oslo, NORWAY
Giovanna Mascheroni, U Cattolica del Sacro Cuore, ITALY

This Blue Sky Workshop concerns the collective development of new research strategies for studying children's interaction with digital technologies and "Internet of Things" or "smart" devices in particular. The organizers of this workshop are EU Kids Online research network members, who have been involved in the design of the new survey measuring children's use of digital media. EU Kids Online is a research network that conducted a large survey with representative samples of children and one of their parents in 25 European countries in 2010. We have now redesigned the 2010 questionnaire and broadened the scope of the questions to capture new technological developments. The data collection process is currently under way. The purpose of this workshop is to discuss the emerging methodological and ethical challenges when studying children's interaction with digital and especially "smart" devices.

A transformed media environment—including the crisis in the funding of high-quality journalism and public service media—requires new combinations of theoretical, normative and empirical insight into media ownership. This panel shows that ownership remains a central issue for understanding the contemporary media, by presenting theoretical and empirical research on different modes of ownership and funding, including corporate, private, nonprofit foundation, state and “arm’s length” public service modes, and drawing on a wide range of international case studies. It brings together eminent analysts with early-career scholars, and combines consideration of news and journalism with discussion of entertainment media. Political economist and policy scholar Victor Pickard kicks off the panel by explaining why questions of ownership matter more than ever in the era of platform giants, showing how policy laid the way for the current oligopoly, and outlining what reforms are necessary for containing new forms of media power. Media industries analyst David Hesmondhalgh continues this theme by discussing the specific problems associated with the corporate form of media ownership, as opposed to other forms of ownership, an issue that is discussed surprisingly rarely in debates about media power. Two papers then attend to more specific conjunctures of ownership and funding. Maria Repnikova and Kecheng Fang analyse Chinese local government interventions in journalism that seek to encourage entrepreneurial behaviours associated with commercial systems. Efrat Nechushtai throws light on issues of public service versus corporate and private ownership by showing how positive socio-cultural dimensions of an entertainment format developed by public service broadcasters were affected as the format was adopted by privately-owned and more commercially-driven organisations around the world. Finally, eminent journalism scholars Rodney Benson and Julie Sedel compare modes of ownership and funding of journalism in three countries, bringing the much-needed comparative dimension offered by the panel into sharper focus, by showing great variance between different forms of “nonprofit” activity in different countries.

Silencing dissent in particular operates to maintain a status quo, but also to cement forced, violent transformation in societies where target groups become those in positions of vulnerability, whether historically set or newly founded. The strategy of silencing dissent robs others of the ability to engage in speech acts, of which false assertion is just one example. The legitimacy of the dissent and their contribution to democratic processes have been under attack. Media that are uncomfortable for the regimes experience various pressures or even closure. Reporters sans Frontières and Freedom House, and human rights observers report that many states routinely deploy techniques designed to suppress independent journalism, manipulate and slant news selectively in their favor, and limit critical coverage of the regime. Silencing is by no means limited to its target. A medium engages in silencing when it describes itself as fair and balanced to an audience that is perfectly aware that it is neither. In effect, they suggest that there is no such thing as fair and balanced, that there is no possibility of balanced news, only propaganda. Silencing is only one kind of propaganda. In silencing, one removes the ability of a target person or group to communicate. Especially silencing dissent puts pressure on democracy, voices are marginalized and language manipulated through various practices. Ranging from medicalisation of the dissent, very visible in situations of political suicides that are not given the space in the public debate but presented as “sick” to deaths in extreme cases as the numbers of killed journalists worldwide shows. Taking it further verbal violence against women can be viewed as silencing dissent, a practice of punishing women for refusing superior-inferior dependency. As DaShanne Stokes says, “Silencing women silences justice”. Legislation procedures are not free from silencing either. Too complicated texts are often an obstacle for citizens to engage in a process and fight for their rights.

Torn apart by conflicting media representations and opposed humanitarian and security pulls, the European and American public spheres are struggling to make sense of the diverse voices from, and about, the largest modern refugee movements. This panel joins journalists and scholars working on Europe, South Asia, North and Central America to examine the intersection of journalistic practices and news discourses over refugee movements and integration in the European Union and North America.

Blue Sky Workshop: Researching (In)Visible Voices in the Digital AgeSponsored Sessions*Chairs

Cornelia Brantner, Institut für Wissenskommunikation und angewandte Forschung, AUSTRIA
 Katharina Lobinger, U della Svizzera italiana, SWITZERLAND
 Merja Mahrt, U of Duesseldorf, GERMANY
 Nina Springer, LMU Munich, GERMANY
 Claudia Wilhelm, U of Erfurt, GERMANY

The workshop aims to connect scholars conducting research on the (in)visibility of voices in digital environments with various theoretical and/or methodological approaches. The goal is to initiate a discussion exceeding the boundaries of scientific fields. We will provide a short introduction and invite the participants to engage in a World Cafe style workshop. Participants will spend about 15 minutes at different stations discussing (1) the applicability of theories on (in)visibility in online environments, (2) the role of social media in providing infrastructures for desired visibility, but also clandestine invisibility, and (3) ethical implications of using visible data not created for research purposes. Outcomes could be networks for collaboration or a special issue of a journal.

The colonial project sustained itself through the invention of an imaginary public. The rationale was that it was not profit, but care, that drove this mission. Today, under the banner of ‘connecting the unconnected’, social media platforms justify their expansion in the Global South. This roundtable asks how techno-oligarchs shape the online voices of the Global South. Scholars of Asia, Africa and the Middle East unpack issues on surveillance, digitization and othering.

Blue Sky Workshop: #ThisEndsHere: A Blue Sky Workshop on Confronting Sexual Harassment and Hostile Climates in Higher Education

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Rosemary Clark-Parsons, U of Pennsylvania, USA

Participants

Pallavi Rao, Indiana U Bloomington, USA

Ayesha Vemuri, McGill U, CANADA

In 2017, the #MeToo movement exposed the widespread nature of sexual harassment across multiple industries in the U.S. Globally, other movements, such as the #LoSHA campaign around harassment in academia in India, also emerged. This Blue Sky Workshop will focus on sexual and racial harassment and hostile climates in higher education and their disproportionate impact on graduate students and early-career scholars. How can senior faculty and administrators work to hold perpetrators accountable? What can bystanders do if they witness abuse? What rights do victims have? How can we cultivate safer and more empowering academic departments and communities?

Panelists will address these questions and more. Attendees are encouraged to contribute their own questions, concerns and calls to action.

The panel critically appraises how cybersecurity interventions transform the development, deployment, and use of information and communication technologies. The panel follows two related analytic threads: (1) it examines the contentious discursive production of cybersecurity within specific legal and policy contexts and traditions; (2) it maps how particular conceptualizations of cybersecurity are translated into durable sets of new laws, policies, and formal and informal governance practices, what the panel refers to as the “bureaucratization of risk.”

Populism is globally on the rise and liberals are concerned about the erosion of democracy and the construction of post-truth regimes across the world. This panel will bring forward an interdisciplinary, structural, and comparative analysis of post-truth debates by collectively addressing the need to de-exceptionalize populism. Specifically, panelists will address questions of populism and post-truth by drawing attention to political economy, cultural theory, and comparative perspectives from the Global South.

Blue Sky Workshop: The Deep Vernacular Web's Great Meme War

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Marc Tuter, U of Amsterdam, THE NETHERLANDS

“The Great Meme War” is an ironic phrase for the actions of a loose-knit collective of Internet trolls, in which they imagine their coordinated use of memes as having contributed to the election of Donald Trump. While political memes were initially interpreted as lowering the transaction costs for engaging in political activism, the so-called Cute Cat Theory of Digital Activism, they soon became much darker, leading to the association between Pepe the Frog and the alt-right. With fringe Internet communities’ vernacular interpretations of political events acquiring increasing significance over the past few years, this workshop seeks to discuss the consequences of the memification of politics.

This panel examines how practices of representation of cultural symbols and their discursive meanings in the media influence racial and ethnic politics in India and the United States following the election victories of Hindu nationalist Prime Minister Narendra Modi and republican conservative party leader Donald Trump respectively. The panel provides understanding of the discursive strategies that generate, sustain, reify or resist discourses of nationalism and how these representations are then able to prescribe racial and ethnic behaviors and identities.

As our media space grows increasingly complex and diversified, there is also increasing need to revisit our theories and methods of old to determine what, if any, changes are needed. In this panel, scholars highlight novel ways that they are advancing the CAM research field. From bringing new theoretical lenses into the discussion to developing new measures or considering new ways to advance and test our theories, these authors are working to push our boundaries and move us forward. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

Recent advances in research on viewpoint diversity have highlighted a need to go beyond assessments of the relative amount (or lack) of diversity and appraise important differences in its qualities and value added to the public debate. This panel aims to spark a scholarly debate about those different ways in which journalists generate viewpoint diversity, the conditions and interventions shaping these practices, and their evaluation against different normative benchmarks.

In 2008, "Public Diplomacy in a Changing World" was published in the ANNALS of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, marking one of the first collections of scholarly articles focusing on public diplomacy. Ten years later, we have an emerging body of scholarship in public diplomacy and an increasing turbulent international context. This panel aims to reflect on the evolution and current state of the art in public diplomacy: on the emerging areas of practice and research, on the relationship with different disciplines and fields of study, on the current issues and future challenges for both theory and practice (e.g., digitalization, mediatization, social networks, evaluation, counter-influencing, and relationship building), as well as on how we can contribute to theory-building in public diplomacy.

The significance of “fans”, “communities”, “publics”, and “networks” are regular, indeed core, claims in the research agendas of media, digital media, and social media studies. There is widespread consensus that the degree of interactivity, active involvement, and co-creation of meaning implied in these terms differentiate them from “audiences”. Much rhetorical weight is carried in the overall highly positive connotations of these concepts, but there is an increasing need to unpack and differentiate them more rigorously.

This panel will examine the potential contributions of economic sociology to the study of media institutions. The panel focuses on the “new economic sociology” that has emerged in sociology since the 1980s around the notions of “embeddedness” in social networks, institutions, and acts of performativity suggesting that economic interactions are structured by the social context in which they occur (Talmud, 2013).

Strauss

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Natasha Shrikant, U of Colorado Boulder, USA

Language and Social Interaction (LSI) scholars will address similarities and differences across LSI approaches through analysis of the interactional accomplishment of identity(ies) in a shared set of data. Data provided is a video-recorded and transcribed excerpt from the facilitator's ethnographic fieldwork with a Texas institution. In the data, participants orient to professional roles, cultural identities and social identity categories such as class, gender and race. Scholars from conversation analysis, critical discourse analysis, ethnography of communication, interactional sociolinguistics, pragmatics, sociocultural linguistics and related areas will, through their analysis of provided data, address tensions and connections in how different areas define identity and take context into account during analysis of identity.

The ethnography of communication is a collaborative, comparative, and cumulative method of research. This roundtable performance by practicing ethnographers will illustrate these qualities with stories from the field. We call this roundtable an “improv” performance because each ethnographer will contribute by building on the comments of the previous speaker in ways that demonstrate how to enact the collaborative, comparative, or cumulative dimension of the ethnography of communication.

Using techniques ranging from participant-observation to legal analysis to the experimental, this panel examines the malleability of copyright and trademark law and policy in: multistakeholderism in Internet governance, political censorship, copyright exceptions in practice, and postcolonial resistance.

Datafied living – a new ‘way of life’ being based on datafication – is emerging. The idea of the panel is to reflect on datafied living in multiple perspectives: shopping, the metricated mindset, credit scoring, data forging and imaginations (active or repressed) of datafied living, to get a sense of its complexity.

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Jeffrey P. Mehlretter Drury, Wabash College, USA

This workshop is designed for teacher-scholars of argumentation, debate and communication ethics to grapple with the post-truth world, in which alternative facts abound and people live in digital echo chambers that reaffirm pre-existing beliefs. The workshop will be a forum for participants to explore this new environment's contours, consider our role(s) in addressing it, and generate strategies for doing so. The goal is for participants to leave with shared resources and tools we can use to teach and promote ethical argumentation. Participants will be asked to provide in advance a paragraph explanation of their interest in the workshop and bring to the workshop one feasible suggestion for how to improve argumentation practices in either the classroom or society.

Media capture hinders plurality and journalism’s democratic functions. By “media capture”, some scholars have referred to media’s failure to become autonomous, persisting in “an intermediate state”, with vested interests and being used for other purposes” (Mungiu-Pippidi, 2013, p. 41). The term first emerged in the economics field to characterize the way in which lobbyists and business interests distorted media regulation for their own benefit. In doing so, capture conceptually departed from other widely used concepts like political instrumentalization or State intervention that merely focused on unduly or extreme intrusion on the part of political powers at the formal, regulatory level. More recently, studies around the world have used the concept to explore the means by which, in cases of fragile rule of the law, informal negotiations have a strong power to negatively impact not only the structural, but also at the organizational, cultural and individual levels of the journalistic field. This panel proposes fresh ways to conceptualize and examine media capture beyond and besides the mere regulatory dimension that first characterized and popularized the concept.

In an age where calls for transparency and openness seemingly conflict with needs for greater privacy and confidentiality, efforts to manage such visibility tensions become especially important. This tension surfaces across the discipline ranging from key relational dialectics and new media affordances, to disclosures about health conditions, popular culture treatments of secrecy, mediations of war/testimony/justice, and intercultural variations regarding privacy. Recently, organizational communication scholars have focused on these topics through a series of special issues exploring visibility, transparency, and hiddenness. This Blue Sky session will provide a conversation space where communication scholars from across the field can briefly share work and discuss some of the key opportunities and challenges for researchers with an interest in issues of (in)visibility management.

From the early days of CAM scholarship, scholars have been asking questions about the role of media in early childhood, particularly as it relates to cognition and learning. And, as the media space evolves, these questions continue to evolve. What does the latest data tell us about media and executive function skills? How and when do children seem to learn from media, both traditional and newer media types? Are there longitudinal relationships between digital media use and cognitive outcomes? In this panel, scholars will attempt to answer these and other questions. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

Drawing on debates within British visual as well as cultural studies (Freedman; Higson; Jameson) and the more recent examinations of nostalgia as “creative remembering”, “critique” and “resistance” (Niemeyer; Pickering & Keightley; Pierson), this panel investigates significance of frameworks developed in Westernized contexts to explore the surge of nostalgic evocations in cinematic spheres and cultural spaces of India, China, Turkey, Pakistan and among Vietnamese Diaspora in Germany.

For years, satire, has contributed to the political discourse around the world. With social media, "fake news" allegations against legacy news media and increased attempts by political leaders to suppress media freedom, satire has become even more important for offering alternative discourses.

In a comparative examination of the role of satire in different media systems (U.S., China, Europe, India, and Egypt), this panel analyses the forms and roles of satire in different media systems.

Blue Sky Workshop: Media Governance as Conceptual and Theoretical Challenge in Researching Law, Policy and the Social World

Sponsored Sessions

Chairs

Katharine Sarikakis, U of Vienna, AUSTRIA

Robin Elizabeth Mansell, London School of Economics and Political Science, UNITED KINGDOM

The concept of media governance has gained attention as an area of research and an evolving theoretical approach, largely as the policy world began paying attention to the enlargement of the policymaking terrain. This involved the extension of participation at the policymaking table for the private sector and civil society in formal roles; it was also, importantly, accompanied by declarations of principles to the value of good governance and, therefore, the role of ethics as an integral part of governance for a global world. Scholarship aimed to capture and map the spaces where governance has happened and to explore the conditions under which forms of expanded participation have yielded more democracy in policymaking. The real-world phenomenon of governance, as driven by global institutions historically, has given also rise to the increased efforts of academe to gain understanding of possibilities and methods to research and theorise it.

Blue Sky Workshop: Evidencing Ideology: Directions for Critical Discourse AnalysisSponsored Sessions*Chair

Chelsea Julian Reynolds, California State U, Fullerton, USA

Ideological analysis is a central concern for critical-qualitative communication researchers. Many sophisticated tools help us identify the uses and abuses of power in discourse. Nevertheless, we have been challenged to demonstrate the reliability and validity of our findings. In this workshop, we introduce Critical Discourse Analysis (CDA) as a rigorous, empirical, critical-qualitative approach to data analysis. We tackle two primary objectives: 1) We address contemporary debates in CDA scholarship, including how we code data using CDA; whether CDA is a theory, method, or worldview; and why CDA is oft-cited but poorly understood in some subfields, and 2) We invite participants to share how they have used CDA in their own work, and how they might apply CDA in future projects.

Respondent

Erica L. Scharrer, U of Massachusetts, Amherst, USA

How often do we consider the child's voice? In CAM scholarship, we argue that children are core, but how often do we hear their voice in our work? How often do we consider their thoughts when it comes to reflecting on what children know (and don't know!) when it comes to media, or cyberbullying policies, or during the design media literacy interventions. How often do we consider the child's voice when it comes to how parents manage media in their home? Perhaps not often enough. In line with the conference theme, "voices", in this panel, scholars will highlight the crucial role of the child's voice. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4-5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10-12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

In an age of political polarization and echo chambers, many scholars understandably have focused on the notion of voice—the actors who speak, what they communicate, and the effects of these voices. Very little research, however, has examined the counterpart of voice—listening. Panelists in this theme session will address normative, theoretical and empirical issues related to listening as democratic practice.

Contemporary societies are experiencing a sustained and historically-specific emphasis on performativity said to be tied to the shift from industrial (Fordist) to post-industrial (post-Fordist) modes of production and the intensification of neoliberalism. This panel explores the concept of post-Fordist "performance economies," in which the production of symbolic content is as important as material infrastructure, and the labor involved is performative—immaterial, affective, emotional, experiential. In our elaboration of this concept, performance economies connect social actors to broader forces that shape and constrain them.

This panel considers the implications of framing counterconduct as being, in de Certeauian terms, of the weak. Panelists will take up a keyword for theorizing alterity and, drawing on stories from the field, discuss whether this analytic has served as a useful entry point or an obstacle in their own research. Taken together, these reflections help inform critical work on marginalized voices, experiences, and media, particularly in the context of how researchers represent marginalized groups.

The panel brings together research from multiple perspectives to clarify what algorithmization in journalism is and entails: a typology of its different forms and analysis of how they might challenge the legal protection of journalism, comparative research into how algorithmically produced metrics influence journalists' work, an investigation into users' preferences and concerns regarding algorithmically selected news, and the study of a news bot provide a holistic account of this controversial phenomenon and its societal consequences.

The panel brings together research from multiple perspectives to clarify what algorithmization in journalism is and entails: a typology of its different forms and analysis of how they might challenge the legal protection of journalism, comparative research into how algorithmically produced metrics influence journalists' work, an investigation into users' preferences and concerns regarding algorithmically selected news, and the study of a news bot provide a holistic account of this controversial phenomenon and its societal consequences.

We are living through extraordinary times in the evolution of the internet's role in democratic politics. Amid the chaos there is a growing debate about whether the mass use of social media platforms may now, in some way or other, be reshaping how public opinion is formed. Are social media platforms causing a crisis of democracy?

The panel will investigate the role of public sector communication to enhance transparency and stimulate civic engagement. We will examine the emerging role of publics who, thanks also to the Internet and social media, can raise their voices to relate and re-connect with public sector organizations. The intersection between these two communication flows will be analyzed in the framework of open government, taking into consideration the role of participatory platforms in a hybrid media system characterized by the increasing spreading of misinformation.

Featuring brief presentations – offered in the vein of provocations rather than full-fledged papers – this roundtable approaches Donald Trump’s ascendance to the US Presidency as a point of departure into ongoing cultural, political, and ideological shifts, which, on the one hand, cohere and embolden anti-immigrant, misogynist, white supremacist, and neo-fascist populisms; and, on the other, undermine and destabilize the epistemic boundaries between falsehoods and alternative facts, rumor and fake news, truth and propaganda.

But the phenomenon of pseudo-news is more complex than popular representations suggest. Panelists from five continents will consider the problem’s various manifestations, examining for whom fake is a problem, what facilitates its operations, and whether new media affordances facilitate distribution and credibility of fake news. Panelists will consider how fake news practices and accusations matter when these represent serious threats versus moral panic.

Sex and sexuality is an important component of adolescent development. And, perhaps not surprisingly, it also has entangled itself into the adolescent media experience. Nowadays, we see teens sexting (and forwarding these sexts, with or without approval). We see them looking to media for messages about sex, including both entertainment media content as well as pornography. And, we see the media reporting and questioning these experiences. With this, researchers have come to question when, if, and how this use might influence cognitions, attitudes and behaviors. These questions often share interesting theoretical overlap, and together, highlight the complex relationship between teens, media and sex today. To feature this work, this session will be presented as a Hybrid High Density Session. Rather than the traditional paper session, in the HHD session, presenters are asked to give a brief (3 minute) “teaser” or “pitch” of their work. This teaser does not cover the entirety of the paper but instead highlights the key questions that the work answers. Presenters may choose to use PowerPoint (maximum of 5 slides) for their pitch, but this is not required. Then, after all presenters deliver their pitch, the session changes to a “poster” (see note) session whereby presenters can more deeply present their work to small groups or in one-to-one discussions with audience members. Please note: due to space limitations, ICA will be implementing a new digital “poster” format for HHD sessions whereby presenters are invited to present an abbreviated poster, slides, or infographic on their personal laptop/touchscreen device, or to provide hand-outs to attendees. Posters affixed to an upright wall or structure will not be permitted.

Prominent communication scientists have pointed out the limited influence of evolutionary theory in communication research. This is, slowly, changing. Consistent with this year's conference theme, this panel "gives voice" to researchers integrating evolutionary theory to test communication science questions. This panel explores topics including signaling theory in interpersonal and organizational contexts, how resource holding potential shapes fear responses in mediated environments, mating strategies and online dating behavior, the ways in which celebrity gossip shapes cooperation, neural processing associated with intimate partner violence, and a theoretical review that upends fight-or-flight theory as an explanation for stress responses among females. These papers forcefully show the new questions and distal explanations that evolutionary theory offers communication scientists.

For feminist scholars in particular voice requires thinking carefully about venue. Academic publishing continues to morph under the pressures of defunding, digitization, and shifts in business models. Conferences like ICA rightly foreground a pathway to publication, but for newly minted PhDs and senior scholars alike, thinking critically and carefully about where to publish is ever more vital. This panel of reviewers, founders, and authors from Ada: A Journal of Gender, New Media, and Technology reflect on the global, feminist ethical foundations of publishing and reviewing on Ada.

Blue Sky Workshop: Graduate Mentorship in the Digital AgeSponsored Sessions*Chair

Nicholas David Bowman, West Virginia U, USA

The mentor-mentee relationship is a crucial component of the graduate school experience. Ideally, the relationship provides both content-related education and guidance about professional responsibilities and socialization into research and scholarship arenas. Complementary mentor-mentee relationships are a boon, but contentious relationships lead to frustration and even failure. Moreover, the growth of communication technologies affords uncommon spaces of formal and informal mentorship, which both compliment and complicate the mentor-mentee relationship. To these ends, our workshop invites members of ICA-in a fishbowl format-to (a) discuss Mentorship philosophies, (b) share experiences as mentors and mentees, and (c) analyze the role of new media in facilitating or restricting mentorship. By collectively probing these learned experiences, the workshop will conclude with a shared best practices document.

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Nearly three-quarters of a century ago, Paul Lazarsfeld's "two-step flow of communication" proposed that voting decisions often are made by consulting other individuals, and that many of these others are typically more exposed to the media than those who consulted them. In the 1940s, the tools of empirical research allowed for the study of only two steps. Lazarsfeld's model has served as a prelude to the empirical study of networks, and to the role of networks in the diffusion of innovation. But implementation of that idea has been thwarted by the obvious contradiction between the design of surveys (whose respondents are few and far apart) and the design of network research (which is based on respondents' connectedness). Today, it is quite possible for the twain to meet. In this plenary, Elihu Katz discusses the legacy of Paul Lazarsfeld in a discipline where networks and the nature of voice have been transformed.

Blue Sky Workshop: Nontraditional Methodologies: Games as Communicative Tools for Transformation and Social Change

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Jessica Wendorf Muhamad, Florida State U, USA

The workshop will center on entertainment-education, specifically experiential opportunities such as social impact games, and how they create safe dialogic spaces. Complex social issues are often inaccessible for numerous reasons (e.g., fear), but through enacted experiences individuals are able to access attitudes, beliefs and behaviors with mitigated negative consequences. In these spaces, individuals are transported to fictional yet probable worlds (via persuasive narrative) and engage in role-playing as a mechanism of change rehearsal. The workshop will address the innovative ways games address social issues by detailing the research practices, community buy-in and organizational involvement. Divided into mini-sessions, the workshop will include in-depth discussions on game development and implementation, as well as demonstrations of game mechanism through hands-on activities.

This panel brings together researchers and scholars who have been trying to understand labors, organizations, innovation, technology and entrepreneurship economy from a communication perspective. The will discuss questions such as How should communication scholars approach these research topics in ways different from business and management scholars? What is the significance and roles of communication in the process of starting a new business? How do entrepreneurs or startup founders organize socially available discourses? And how have communication technologies accelerated the realization of startup business? Given the panel's position in the Organizational Communication Division, there will be an "organizing" focus through the panel's focus on organizational design, innovation, and communication technology.

Blue Sky Workshop: Doing Communication History: A Methodological RoundtableSponsored Sessions*Chair

Samantha Oliver, U of Pennsylvania, USA

Far from being the sole provenance of historians, work in communication history has long been found across the divisions and interest groups of ICA. This Blue Sky Workshop brings together scholars interested in historical research on any topic for a roundtable discussion on methodological approaches to interrogating the past. This discussion will be framed by a panel of established scholars who utilize a variety of historical research methods, including but not limited to archival work, interviews and oral history, visual methods, material culture and digital methods. Participants will leave the workshop with a sense of the breadth and depth of communication history research, as well as a preliminary methodological toolkit that can be utilized in their own endeavors.

The study of emotions is central to research in media psychology, yet some basic emotions such as fear, joy, and anger have received the preponderance of attention. However, the landscape of emotion is much broader and more complex than foundational scholarship may imply, including emotional responses to media that may be characterized as mixed affect, that may be difficult to describe unambiguously, or that are not represented in every language. This panel will engage prominent scholars in media psychology to present brief overviews of emotions that deserve additional research attention in media psychology.

Listening, as the sociotechnical management of sound, structures the chaffing of signal from noise, the identification of salient versus extraneous communication, and, ultimately, decisions about which voices and voicings count. Through diverse objects of study -- noise measurement tools, speech recognition algorithms, Occupy assembly listening, and audio recordings of protests -- the panelists explore how the distinction between meaningful sound and noise, by machines and by human ears, is values-laden, politically- and culturally-situated, and historically constituted.

This panel places contemporary controversies around truthfulness and fakery in perspective by examining episodes in the history of veracity. Looking critically at processes through which truthfulness has been established, contested, and reified, and examining the histories of traits associated with veracity, including factuality, objectivity, and quantifiability, this panel situates present-day anxieties around the malleability of factual information, the collection of user data, and the contingent nature of objectivity within a longer historical trajectory.

Content analysis. It's a core method in the field of communication, argued by some to be our method. And it's important because it provides insight into the messages that users are receiving. In this panel, researchers will present their newest content analytic work in the CAM space. Ranging from analyses of character representation and violence in television to questions about the messages children receive from food advertisements or from books, this panel provides an inside look at the children's media space. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

Online platforms now routinely use opaque algorithmic curation to automatically filter and organize everything (Gillespie, 2017). An unsigned editorial in Nature recently warned, “largely absent from the use of such algorithms are the rules and safeguards that govern almost every other aspect of life in a democracy” (2016). Indeed, these seemingly-unknowable algorithms have amassed a dismal record of error, fraud, and discrimination (e.g., see Sandvig et al., 2014). The obvious role of communication researchers and accountability journalists in this moment is to investigate these platforms and algorithms from the outside (Diakopoulos, 2016). To ask questions like: Does the Facebook news feed accelerate the spread of propaganda? Does LinkedIn bias job results based on the applicant’s gender or race? When Spotify suggests music, what parts of our cultural heritage are promoted (or forgotten)? Were there apartments for sale on Homes.com that some users never saw? How does Google gather personal data? Yet globally, online platforms have taken action against the researchers and journalists who study them; some website terms of service even prohibit visiting the site for the purpose of research. Platforms have argued that research bots, scrapers, sock-puppet accounts, and even reading a website and writing down what you see there violates the terms of service and constitutes hacking, theft, breach of contract, or trespassing (Wu, 2013). Researchers have had their social media accounts blocked, been issued cease-and-desist letters, and faced de-funding and worry about lawsuits and arrest even when they are based in liberal democracies. This interactive roundtable discussion brings together legal experts on these issues and researchers who have faced these problems. It features counsel for Sandvig v. Sessions (Bhandari and Goodman), an ongoing lawsuit brought by the U.S. ACLU on behalf of communication researchers and journalists to protect research in the public interest from draconian U.S. hacking laws. It also includes the named plaintiff from the suit (Sandvig) and features a principal investigator of the Streaming Heritage Project (Vonderau). In May 2017, Streaming Heritage’s funding from the Swedish Research Council was targeted by a Spotify complaint alleging illegal and unethical behavior by researchers. We promise an interactive format that offers short opening statements and prioritizes participant questions

Voice plays a critical role in domestic and transnational debates about solidarity, cultural citizenship and belonging related to racial and ethnic minorities, refugees and migrants. Whether transmitted through individuals, social groups, opinion leaders or nonprofit organizations, the voices are often carried through a wide range of media. Online news media, organization websites, social media, terrestrial radio and online chat forums express voice by amplifying current discourses surrounding marginalized groups in the homeland or in diaspora. In some instances, these expressions of voice raise concerns about the legitimacy of those who have taken on the role of public diplomacy by speaking for ethnic minorities and transnational migrants. In other cases, the refugees and immigrants take on the duties of organizing their own collective voices to empower their own communities. Reflecting on the International Communication Association's conference theme of Voices, this panel seeks to interrogate the ways in which a variety of opinion leaders, nonprofit organizations and ethnic minority groups attempt to shape and direct public opinion in national and international debates surrounding discourses related to immigrants, refugees and other marginalized groups. We examine a wide variety of cases including: The South Asian Journalists Association's media that facilitates an inclusive vision of empathy for immigrants while also signifying cosmopolitan diasporic media professionals; queer Hmong voices streaming on terrestrial radio broadcasts amplifying diasporic political voice; Myanmar refugees' fates reported in news media during a period of fewer refugee resettlements and turbulent global political backlash; and China's online forums in which opinion leaders mediate netizens' racial attitudes toward African communities in China. We ask how these diasporic communities use various media to influence, empower or constrain others to shape the social, cultural, economic and political global climate. These studies are based on scholarship that centers on migration, global communication and social change. Thus, this panel seeks to provide new knowledge about the wide array of voices of immigrants and other minority groups communicating in a complex global media environment.

As researchers focus on the outcomes that follow from communication (e.g., persuasion, social influence, relationship formation and dissolution, social evaluations), the language individuals use in interactions is often overlooked. This interactive session puts language into focus as participants discuss intersections between communication research, language, and social psychology. The International Association of Language and Social Psychology (IALSP) invites all ICA participants to join our session and engage in a roundtable discussion about the role of language in communication research. Discussants and facilitators will take a variety of positions raising awareness of the importance of language in the study of communication. This is an excellent opportunity for ICA participants whose research addresses language to network with a group of scholars with similar interests across research contexts including health communication, intercultural communication, intergroup communication, lifespan communication and aging, and interpersonal communication. Bernadette Watson (Hong Kong Polytechnic, IALSP Past-President) will discuss language use in health contexts. Applying a uniquely intergroup and health frame, she invites participants to consider through discussion how language represents intergroup relations in the health context. She asks, for example, “What does the status differential between health professionals sound like when language is examined and how does this influence the ongoing culture of the hospital context?” Yan Bing Zhang (U of Kansas, IALSP Treasurer) will discuss language in intercultural encounters. She invites participants to consider through discussion the preexisting powers that operate behind language choices in intercultural contexts (e.g., economic, political, social and personal). Taking a uniquely intergroup and interpersonal frame, she will lead a discussion on the extralinguistic outcomes of language selection and use with respect to considerations of affiliation, competence, and intergroup attitudes. Jessica Gasiolek (U of Hawaii at Manoa, IALSP Communications Officer) will discuss language use across the lifespan. She invites participants to consider through discussion how theories that bridge communication and social psychology (i.e., communication accommodation theory) can help us better understand how the language choices people make can affect intergenerational relationships, attitudes toward aging, and experiences of successful aging. Marko Dragojevic (U of Kentucky, IALSP Publications Officer) will discuss the role of language in social categorization processes. He invites participants to consider through discussion how language variation (e.g., accent, dialect) acts as a cue to social categorization, shifting interactions from interpersonal to intergroup and activating stereotypes (i.e., language attitudes) that guide subsequent interaction.

In recent years, feminists could be forgiven for thinking that we were making progress against rape culture. In 2011, the Obama administration distributed pro-victim Title IX guidelines for adjudicating campus rape. In 2014, California passed a law on active consent (Yes Means Yes) and the massive #YesAllWomen hashtag documented and criticized the everyday harassment of women. Beginning in 2011, in cities around the world, annual Slutwalks dramatically reframed rape discourse away from victim blaming. And then came Trump, a presidential candidate who bragged, in a widely distributed video, about sexually assaulting women. When you are famous, he said, you can do what you like, you can grab them by the pussy. Despite calls that he resign from the campaign, Trump minimized his statements as “locker room talk,” continued the campaign, and was elected president in 2016, by, among other groups, a majority of White women. One of the first acts of Trump’s Education Secretary, Betsy DeVos, was to walk back the Obama Title IX guidelines for campus rape. While this Trumpian backlash was unfolding, though, more than 3.6 million women voted with their feet—and their pussy hats—against the sexual harasser-in-chief through the Women’s March on January 21, 2017. And in the months since the march, several celebrities—Roger Ailes, Bill O’Reilly, and Harvey Weinstein—have been fired from high profile positions after evidence of their sexual harassment, often stretching over decades, was publicized in mainstream media, not incidentally, in stories most often broken by women reporters. What are we to make of these seeming contradictions? What is the “real” status of sexual assault discourse in the U.S.? Why was Weinstein brought down and Trump elevated? Was Weinstein’s public fall a win for feminism? The recent public censures of famous harassers are important. But it is also true that none of these high-profile perpetrators have (yet) gone to jail for their crimes, and the media framing of their crimes has often fallen short of a deep critique of rape culture. And, although millions of women marched in the biggest protest in U.S. history, it has not stopped Republican attacks on abortion, contraception, and campus rape rights. This panel interrogates contemporary sexual assault discourses—from mainstream news to Tinder to campus activist discourses—to illuminate some of the complex and contradictory dynamics of feminism/misogyny at work in public communication about sexual assault.

On September 3, 2015, during the peak of what was to be coined a “refugee crisis” in Europe, The Guardian published a piece giving advice on “what can you do to help? From donating to a charity to volunteering – here is a guide to some of the practical ways that individuals can contribute”. While suggesting that the British government and other British media outlets were promoting fear over compassion, it positioned the task of refugee resettlement as an expectation on British society by means of charitable contributions, volunteering, and protest. The role of individuals becoming active—and even activists—in a situation where neoliberal state politics fail to provide sufficient support urges us to reconsider notions and definitions of activism and civic engagement. Similarly, it raises questions about the role of media in framing discourses on the resettlement of those fleeing conflict—discourses which presuppose certain expectations for governments, citizens, and even refugees themselves. As the initial example shows, media play a crucial role in negotiating and framing discourses around the tasks of individuals as members of civil societies, when they become engaged or ultimately activists. This panel explores the boundaries of activism, volunteering, and civic engagement that arise in media coverage of refugee resettlement. The five papers will examine the dynamics of media, civic action and refugee migration in new ways on a theoretical, empirical and methodological level. The question of how media interact with and affect civic action in settings of forced migration on micro- and macro-levels connects the papers. Case studies will be presented from Northern and Central Europe as well as from the Middle East to approach notions of hospitality and activist civic actions both historically and contemporary. How are media actors and platforms within the relationship between refugees, citizen-volunteers, and the state? Panelists will address how media play a role in framing the actions of voluntary assistance to refugees—when is it activism, public service or human kindness? The papers present studies of media coverage, historically and contemporary, of journalists, refugees, communities and activists. Using a broad range of perspectives around the same question, this panel will hence provide a conceptual and methodological toolbox for exploring notions of activism in media-saturated societies in an age of migration.

This panel wants to seize the central topic of this year’s annual conference (“voices”) to assemble contributions that gauge our contemporary society’s sentiments by contrasting the vociferous populists that galvanize electorates through new and old media with the usually voiceless migrants that rely on social media or NGOs to make their voices heard. The panel includes studies that rely on traditional research methods, such as human-coded content analysis and frame analysis, but also boasts contributions that use big-data approaches to identify opinion patterns in social media. The papers cover the following topics: the presence of citizen voices in setting the agenda of five European national parliaments, the predictive power of social media to anticipate the support for welcoming refugees, a comparison of the rhetorical toolkits employed by Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton during the 2016 U.S. presidential campaign, the framing of the Catalanian independence referendum in mainstream and social media, and the degree of success of Spanish lobbies in setting the national parliamentary and media agenda.

Identifying Visual Silences: Using Surveys and Interviews to Identify the Photographs News Photographers Don’t Take

Rachel Somerstein, SUNY New Paltz, USA

The news world is a construction of reality, not a reflection of it. Yet, absences and silences in the mass media can be difficult to identify; how can we locate what isn’t there? The literature on symbolic annihilation is rich, and empirical research continues to demonstrate that women, people of color, people of lower socioeconomic status, and other marginalized groups are left out of visual and written representations in the mass media. But what other groups, events, statistics, voices, scenes and histories are absent from the news media, and what methods can communication scholars use to find them? What sources beyond the media can scholars employ as tools to identify these gaps while attending to the need to study silences and absences systematically? And what theories might media scholars use to identify silences and omissions? This panel brings together five scholars working on absences in media representation that span visual studies, feminist studies, cultural studies and inequality studies. Taken together, the panel aims to offer new methods of identifying absences in mass media content, by considering complementary qualitative and quantitative approaches, including content analysis, interviews, photo elicitation, rich media analysis, framing analysis and other methods. The need for identifying these silences is great. Articulating absences is a crucial first step in identifying the influences that shape and hinder mediated expression. Recognizing these silences can also provide media practitioners with a map of to whom they might reach out to create media content that is more just, inclusive, and diverse. And articulating absences also helps scholars to further articulate the ways in which the “news world” departs from reality.

As screen time becomes increasingly interwoven into our daily lives, research has begun to include a broader menu of effects. Scholarship has examined the impact of screen time on children's cognitive and neural functioning, their sleep patterns, and their ability to interact meaningfully with others. At the same time, screen time has impacted parenting patterns and generated much discussion about guidelines that can be used to counteract its myriad effects. The experts in this session collectively will present the latest perspectives on both the dangers and benefits of screen time.

When digital media (especially social media) began to make inroads into the media space of young people, one of the first issues that scholars began to tackle was cyberbullying. And, to this day, this issue remains important for study. But, as the digital media space has evolved, we have seen other safety concerns arise as well—particularly concerns regarding privacy. Just how much is shared? What is too much? What do teens think about when it comes to privacy? What do they do to protect themselves in the online space? In this panel, scholars advance our theoretical, practice, and public policy understanding of cyberbullying and then—pushing us further—ask about newer concerns, particularly related to privacy protection in the online world. This is a CAM traditional paper panel. In these sessions, presenters prepare a presentation of their manuscript. A total of 4–5 thematically-similar presentations are planned (roughly 10–12 minutes per presentation) along with a discussant (approximately 5 minutes per session). The discussant will be asked to respond to the content of each paper and connect the papers to one another and to the broader field.

Participants articulate ways to deconstruct such discourses related to white supremacy, toxic masculinities, conservative evangelical Christianity, ableism and heteronormativity that have been framed as "marginalized" on college campuses and beyond. Specifically, we offer strategies for dialogue, student activities and ways to reframe discussions of privilege and disadvantage.

Blue Sky Workshop: Developing Research and Curriculum in Health Communication: Exploring the Intersections of Health, Rhetoric and Identity

Sponsored Sessions

Chairs

Kayla Rhidenour, Baylor U, USA
 Ashley Katherine Barrett, Baylor U, USA
 Jessica Lynn Ford, Ohio U, USA

We will examine the overlapping areas between two prominent subfields within our discipline: rhetorical studies and health communication. Although health is commonly studied within interpersonal and organizational communication, rhetorical studies of health are less prominent but quickly emerging. Past research taking a rhetorical perspective on health communication has centered on health campaigns and promotions. This panel emphasizes the theoretical and practical contributions of additional health rhetoric research, such as the influential health discourses and health portrayals circulated by the media and educating our publics. A second objective of this workshop is to use these conversations to expand current health communication curriculum. Students majoring in health communication must understand the powerful, and sometimes deceiving, ways that health discourses create shared meanings across society.

Blue Sky Workshop: Supporting Voices with Visuals: How to Improve Presentation Slide-Design with the Assertion-Evidence ApproachSponsored Sessions*ChairsPeter Nello Miraldi, Pennsylvania State U, USA
Lori Beth Miraldi, Pennsylvania State U, USA

Although our computer technology has drastically improved since 1987, the way that we present information using PowerPoint has not. We are stuck in the past using a template design that was created by an entrepreneur and a computer programmer. We know now that this template, which relies primarily on verbal information, does not embrace research-based findings of psychology and multimedia studies. It is time that we bring our presentations out of the past and utilize our knowledge of how people learn to create improved and more effective slide presentations. This workshop will focus primarily on the Assertion-Evidence slide design, which eliminates noise from slides, limits the amount of verbal information displayed, and incorporates purposeful visual evidence. In addition, this slide design has been shown to significantly increase audience comprehension and retention of information presented.

This roundtable will discuss the declining trust in liberal institutions in the context of Central and Eastern European countries where recently elected governments have embraced populist politics, nationalism and other identity-based ideologies. It will raise questions concerning the place and role of the media in these developments across the region in a comparative perspective. The countries in focus will be Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Poland and Slovakia.

Blue Sky Workshop: Future Directions for Public Diplomacy Research

Sponsored Sessions

Chair

Leysan Khakimova Storie, Zayed U, UNITED ARAB EMIRATES

This workshop provides opportunities for discussions about the future of public diplomacy research. An interdisciplinary field, public diplomacy increasingly attracts researchers from various fields, including public relations, rhetoric, political communication and international relations, to name a few. A recently established Public Diplomacy Interest Group at ICA suggests the field is growing and developing. However, public diplomacy may appear as a fragmented field, with few distinct public diplomacy theories, and most research using theories from other areas. The purpose of this workshop is to facilitate discussion about the current state of public diplomacy research, the needs, concerns and directions for future research. Participants will deliberate about public diplomacy research in terms of topics, methodologies, paradigms and publishing opportunities.

Now that the 40th anniversary of Chinese Communication Scholarship is approaching, we invite scholars to participate in the ICA Postconference combined with the 8th Global Communication Forum. In 1978, two independent publications from Fudan U in Shanghai and People's U in Beijing revealed contemporary thinking about public relations, mass communication, and journalism from Western perspectives. Over the course of the ensuing 40 years, the prominence of these areas has endured, yet new areas and methodologies have produced more sophisticated, nuanced and Chinese-centered scholarship in these and other communication contexts. Using this 40-year landmark, this postconference celebrates past accomplishments while tracing themes and insights into the present as a foundation for innovative Chinese scholarship in the upcoming decade(s). Since the birth and development of China's Communication scholarship, there has always been dialogue and cooperation between East and West, between Chinese and international scholars. This is also a process of interaction and integration between globalization and localization of Communication theories and practices. The Chinese Communication scholarship has its own power and influence in political, economic, technological, cultural and other aspects of the country's development in the past four decades. After 40 years of efforts, China's Communication discipline has reached a mature stage. We look forward to reviewing the past 40 years' dissemination of the discipline with scholars from China and overseas through dialogues and reflections. We will examine and discuss the past achievement, existing problems, as well as different voices in the context of globalization and localization. We will also look into the future for the next ten years and beyond. A crucial question is, how can we facilitate more productive collaborations among and incorporate the different voices of the International Communication Association and Chinese communication scholars? Communication researchers have the responsibility to seek answers; against the background of globalization, China and the rest of the world cannot be separated. Therefore, this combined ICA Postconference and 8th Global Communication Forum opens a platform for researchers interested in the Voices of Chinese Scholars Over the Last 40 years. We cordially invite people and scholars from all over the world to share their findings, exchange insights, and make efforts to promote communication research.

With a few noteworthy exceptions, there has been little attention devoted to how lobbyists actually communicate. Thus, this postconference invites contributions addressing the topic of lobbying and democracy, and the role communication plays in this regard. What communication strategies are employed and how these can be evaluated against democratic goals of participation, as well as the problem of unequal influence and regulatory capture?
