PRECONFERENCE: Beyond Germany: German Media Theory in a Global Context
Thursday
Sponsored Sessions
10:00–18:00
OFFSITE:
Goethe Institute
Chairs
Bernhard Debatin, Ohio U, USA
Andreas Ströhl, Goethe Institut, USA
Wolfgang Suetzl, Ohio U, USA

This preconference examines the reception of German media theorists beyond the boundaries of the German language. As German media theory is becoming available in translation across the globe, what kind of readings and critiques is it receiving? In what kind of theoretical and socio-political contexts are such readings performed? The preconference, hosted by the Goethe Institut, will offer a forum to discuss the exchange of media theory between German-language writers and the global community of communication scholars.

PRECONFERENCE: Environmental Communication Beyond Boundaries: Transnational, International, and Comparative Approaches to Understanding Environmental Issues

Sponsored Sessions

Friday
8:00–17:00
OFFSITE: George Washington U School of Public Health

Chairs
Suzannah Evans Comfort, Indiana U Bloomington, USA
Julia Metag, U of Fribourg, SWITZERLAND
Bruno Takahashi, Michigan State U, USA
Jagadish Thaker, Massey U, NEW ZEALAND

The aim of this preconference is to bring together scholars from around the world to share research related to transnational and international aspects of environmental communication. While environmental issues are often fundamentally global in that causes and effects of environmental risk can be separated by thousands of miles and connected by the forces of globalization, most research related to environmental communication has focused on individual nations as the site of inquiry. In addition, environmental communication research has primarily featured nations in the Global North. Therefore, this preconference especially welcomes research related to and/or produced in the Global South.

PRECONFERENCE: Organizational Communication Doctoral Consortium

This ICA preconference discusses the relevance of a welfare-state perspective for media transformation and regulation. The concept of a “media welfare state” has been used to characterize Nordic media, but this preconference brings together contributors from different societies and media systems to discuss whether the concept has a wider relevance. The preconference is organized as a series of panels addressing conceptual, theoretical and empirical issues, and will engage participants in discussions over contradictions and dilemmas.
The “new era” of politics following the Brexit vote in Britain, the Trump election in the U.S., and political upheavals elsewhere in Europe and recently in Brazil challenge settled ideas about media, politics, and culture. Media are at the center as populist movements and politicians use symbols and tropes of remembered, repressed, contested, implicit and explicit valences of “the religious.” This preconference will consider this and the broader challenge religion poses to critical media scholarship.

This preconference aims to explore how resistance displaces the boundaries established by neoliberalism, by focusing on how resistance is being (re)organized? We will share studies and practices of resistance to reveal the communicative dynamics that expand and/or disrupt the boundaries of neoliberal normativity. The following questions could be addressed: which practices/discourses shape resistance and with what effects? How do alternative modes of organizing redefine boundaries of neoliberalism? What can communication do to reorganize resistance?

Preconference for Political Communication Graduate Students.

This is a hands-on workshop, aiming to familiarize participants with research possibilities that are offered by computer vision methods, and also incorporate these methods into their research.
PRECONFERENCE: The Long History of Modern Surveillance: Excavating the Past, Contextualizing the Present

PRECONFERENCE: Are We Moving towards Convergence? Revisiting Communication Disciplines, Theories, Models, and Concepts

Friday
9:00–17:00

Fairchild
(Washington Hilton, Terrace Level)

Chairs
Anne Ellerup Nielsen, Aarhus U, DENMARK
Winni Johansen, Aarhus U, DENMARK

Moderators
Helle Aggerholm, Aarhus U, DENMARK
Birte Asmuss, Aarhus U, DENMARK
Finn Frandsen, Aarhus U, DENMARK
Cynthia Stohl, U of California, Santa Barbara, USA
Maureen Taylor, U of Tennessee, Knoxville, USA
Christa Thomsen, Aarhus U, DENMARK

Over the past two decades, communication scholars have been preoccupied with debating the intellectual boundaries among disciplines, theories, models and concepts, as well as the institutional legitimacy of the field as such. Topics such as “convergence”, “bridging”, “interdisciplinary paradigm” have emerged. The debate takes place inside and across disciplines. The purpose of this preconference is to study and contribute to this debate. Scholars within organizational, business, corporate, strategic communication, and/or public relations are invited to participate.

PRECONFERENCE: Mediated Recognition: Identity, Justice and Activism

Friday
9:00–17:00

Khanyile Mlotshwa, U of KwaZulu-Natal, SOUTH AFRICA
The Show “Black Humour” and the Inclusive Laughter: Comedy, Recognition and Cultural Identities
Recognition plays a crucial role in cross-boundary identity formation of individuals and groups and it is a central feature in social struggles. What social theories of recognition overlook though is the role of media, technology and communication. Therefore, this preconference aims to (1) update social theories of recognition by acknowledging its mediated and datafied nature and (2) to advance post-disciplinary debates on identity formation and (mis)representation, metricised and datafied recognition, social justice and politics.

PRECONFERENCE: Bridging Borders: Public Interest Communications in the Global Context

Friday

Social media have proven their potential both for good and bad: they catalyzed pro-democracy revolutions and the #MeToo movement, but also provided forums for misinformation and racist propaganda. This workshop will examine policy for social media, including government policies, regulations and laws and the policies of corporations. Can policy be developed, while protecting values such as freedom of speech? Papers presented in the workshop shall be considered for publication in the Journal of Information Policy.

Mediated sport is a highly celebrated constituent of popular culture that often intersects with shifting political, economic, technological and cultural conditions. These related tensions run deep through the history of mediated sport. Yet the rapidly evolving sport media industry and the changing face of mediated sport production continues to raise original critical questions in new emerging contexts. This one-day preconference therefore pays attention to issues of sport, representation, power and social justice.

The growth of automated data collection and its installation within contemporary social, economic and political orders has created a number of huge challenges: for protecting fundamental rights and values, for understanding the connections between communications and social order. This preconference aims to bring together communications scholars with legal scholars and other researchers in sociology and management for focused discussions about the latest practical and theoretical ways forward in the face of these challenges.

PRECONFERENCE: Environmental Communication Division: Graduate Student Preconference

Friday
9:00–12:00
OFFSITE: George Mason U - Arlington

Chairs
Adina Abeles, Stanford U, USA
Adam Rainear, U of Connecticut, USA
Jonathon Schuldt, Cornell U, USA

The 2nd annual environmental communication division graduate student preconference will bring together students working in environmental communication and similar fields with experienced scholars. We invite graduate students, post-docs and other researchers who work in topics related to the environment, science, natural resources, and sustainability to submit their work. Our goals for this half day preconference are to provide a forum to connect with other scholars, gather feedback on research projects, and receive advice pertaining to early career success from leading experts in the field.

This preconference, at Georgetown U, addresses issues raised by Chakravartty et al.’s (2018) Journal of Communication #CommunicationSoWhite article regarding the underrepresentation of nonwhite, feminist, queer, post-colonial, and Indigenous voices within the field of communication. The preconference is thematically tied to two sessions in the main conference:

1. A roundtable on #CommunicationSoWhite, led by Paula Chakravartty; and
2. A CAT panel titled “#CommunicationSoWhite Interventions in Communication and Technology Studies.”
PRECONFERENCE: From Knowledge to Action: Enhancing the Impact of Health Communication Research and Practice

Friday
Sponsored Sessions

Chair
Monique Turner, George Washington U, USA

Moderators
Gary Kreps, George Mason U, USA
Rajiv Rimal, George Washington U, USA

There is a strong theoretical and research foundation for health communication at many levels, but many in the field seek broader impact. This preconference will bring together a variety of funders, scholars, practitioners, representative of community organizations, and participants in an effort to exchange knowledge and strategies for enhancing the impact of our health communication work. The preconference will mix short presentations with small round-table discussions in an effort to share knowledge and develop networks.

PRECONFERENCE: Crafting Theory: Methods of Theory Building in Communication

Friday
Sponsored Sessions

Chairs
Felix Frey, Leipzig U, GERMANY
Benjamin Krämer, Ludwig-Maximilians-U Munich, GERMANY

The state of theory building in communication has been the object of lamentation, disappointment, caricature, even ridicule, but also appeals and aspiration throughout the history of our field. Rather than restating deficiencies in our field’s theory building in comparison with our neighboring disciplines or reiterating the reasons for or consequences of these deficits time and again, this preconference aims to collect and advance our field’s methodological tools and practices for theory building. We are interested in a methodological discussion of cognitive operations, individual and social practices, and empirical approaches researchers use in this process of theory building.

PRECONFERENCE: Engaged Journalism: Bridging Research and Practice

Darryl Holliday, City Bureau, USA
Fiona Morgan, Branchhead, USA

As journalists across the globe continue to face distrustful audiences and uncertain economics, many have begun experimenting with novel forms of news production with the hope of solving the news industry’s ills. Although many scholars research these innovations, few have found ways to make that research impactful outside of the academic community. This preconference bridges this divide, by bringing together journalism innovators and researchers to discuss best practices for collaborations between the two.
PRECONFERENCE: Leaving the Ivory Tower: The Promises and Perils of Public Engagement

Sponsored Sessions

Moderators

Several years after Gamergate revealed the perils that the digital age poses for academics, we have an opportunity to reflect on what we have learned. This half-day pre-conference workshop aims to bring together a diverse group of communication scholars to discuss both the potential benefits and pitfalls of academic public engagement. The workshop will comprise two parts: one session of paper presentations with Q&A and one broader round-table discussion of best practices.

PRECONFERENCE: Critical Incidents in Journalism

Sponsored Sessions

Chairs

Joy Jenkins, Reuters Institute for the Study of Journalism, UNITED KINGDOM
Edson Tandoc, Nanyang Technological U, Singapore, SINGAPORE
Ryan Thomas, U of Missouri, USA
Oscar Westlund, Oslo Metropolitan U, NORWAY

This preconference seeks to bring together analyses of various critical incidents in journalism around the world, with the goal of synthesizing how journalists reflect on their practices, and based on what parameters and with what resolutions, when they face challenges. This will help us consolidate journalistic reflections and research findings to allow us to theorize on the discursive function of critical incidents, the utility of analyzing journalistic discourse, and the patterns to journalistic reflections during critical incidents.

The 69th Annual Conference of the International Communication Association (ICA) looks to communication beyond boundaries, and the conference will feature scholarship that crosses disciplinary, geographical and epistemological boundaries. But at a time of populist backlash, where proposals to build walls between nations and to withdraw from multilateral agreements are a feature of our times, and where global digital platforms routinely challenge notions of national culture and national sovereignty, are mantras of a “global village” and “global community” appropriate? This panel brings together speakers from the United States, Europe and China, and from the global NGO community, to consider the roles that communication plays in today’s global and digital environment, what challenges lie ahead for scholars and practitioners in the field, and how we as communication researchers can best respond to them.

The assumption that citizens share an orientation toward the public sphere, dependent on news, still looms large over media and communication research. However, the tenets of mass press theory, which stipulate a journalism practice and ethic that encourages informed citizenship, seem increasingly misaligned with current political trends. This panel explores the tension between journalism’s longstanding rational-critical mandate and recent political strategy, to reconsider how journalism’s ability to forge public connection is understood, evaluated, and researched.

This international panel brings together quantitative and qualitative researchers to discuss the interplay between leaders’ images and nations’ images. The panel will dissect concepts such as “charm offensive,” “mediated public diplomacy,” “personal projection” and “nation brand”. We will also offer evidence regarding national leaders’ ability to provide rationales for opinion building regarding their nations.

#CommunicationSoWhite stimulated a much-needed conversation about the colonial legacies of white supremacy and the racial inequalities that permeate the field of Communication. Rather than repeat the findings from the article, our roundtable takes up questions about race and representation within our field in the present political moment. Ultimately, we seek to continue the conversation about how to make the field more representative such that our scholarship can become a progressive force in addressing issues of inequality across various registers of difference.

Come see the latest advances at the intersection of health, fear, and risk perceptions and biology! What can our eyes tell us about how to design better health messages? How does playing violent video games affect the brain’s perception of pain? How does the brain respond to suspenseful films? The studies in this panel use biological signals from the eyes, brain, and body to move the boundary of knowledge about health, fear, and risk perceptions.

How are governments, organizations, and individuals benefiting from and coping with information excess? This panel takes up this question by investigating how these groups deal with the rapid scaling of data production. The presentations examine tensions between narratives that celebrate the opportunities of digital excess and those that lament its dangers—contradictions that occur within and between the papers. Together, the presentations explore efforts to combat and survive, capitalize on and profit from information overload.

Interrogating Euro-American approaches to the study of global populism, this panel examines the historical lineages and technological innovations behind recent articulations of authoritarian populism in the global South. Developing comparisons across Asia, South America and Europe, the panel identifies diverse vulnerabilities to authoritarian innovations by populist political leaders and shared experiences of unfettered experimentation by Big Tech firms. We consider possibilities and obstacles for resistance in “low-rights environments” that serve as testbeds for techno-authoritarian innovations.

Concerns about political expression, trustworthiness of news, and online propaganda have been rising worldwide. As youth become socialized in the political arena, they have the potential for exposure to different voices including online extremists, and they can also build and express their own political voice. This panel explores ways in which news and propaganda are received by youth, particularly considering their position relative to the news itself, and their expression of their own political voice.
This panel will present a cross-section of research on the local news employees who help international news organizations cover the wars and political conflicts unfolding in their regions of the world. The themed panel presentations will discuss local journalists, stringers, and fixers who work across multiple media, in a variety of cultural and geographical contexts. Some of the presentations will be “cross-country” in focus, while others will be nationally specific. The panel comprises one chair and five presenters. Two of the presenters have previously worked as local journalists themselves.

The infrastructural turn within digital media studies has sought to reimagine digital media platforms and technologies as utility like structures that form the background and the terrain on which we live our creative, commercial, social and political lives. Their global scope opens up a fruitful area of enquiry that seeks to understand the various cultural iterations of those platforms. This panel pursues that enquiry through four case studies about the appropriation of the digital within key contexts in India.

Many communicative social justice interventions are exceedingly top-down wherein organizations and funding agencies already have a standard intervention formula to achieve desired outcomes. We argue for the importance of culture-centered interventions that put the community’s voice at the center of problem-solving of issues that affect their community (Dutta, 2008). Through different projects that use the culture-centered approach as theoretical and methodological compass, our panel will discuss the intricacies of working with disenfranchised communities in pursuing solutions community members deem fit for their community through their own meaning-making.

News avoidance is an increasing problem. As news companies lose consumers, democracies lose informed citizens. The specific character of and underlying reasons behind news avoidance are unclear, however. Therefore, this panel brings together studies that focus on these questions. By doing so, the panel aims to foster a discussion on how journalism studies can cross boundaries and engage with citizens, media professionals, and policy makers to help reconnect news avoiders and the news media.

What sorts of feminist digital publics form through social media? What happens to call out movements focused on gender based harassment when they encounter each other and the world through internet connectivity? Social media based call out movements have emerged not only in the global north nations but also in the global south. This panel draws on call out movements/events from four regions - China, India, U.S. and South Korea - but also looks at issues around the two histories - the histories of women on the internet and the histories of calling out sexual harassment. Rather than focus on one single hashtag movement, we examine the role of list making and social media contagion as well as issues of embodiment and place in relation to recent call out movements from these four contexts and geographical locations that we draw on.

In this panel we address media criticism from far-right actors and how journalism responds to it. Research has indicated that far-right actors actively challenge the communicative authority of professional journalism. A central question is if, and how, such public engagement should be countered. The panel consists of theoretical and empirical contributions that illuminate current responses to far-right media criticism, and critical perspectives concerning how this kind of public engagement should be understood and theorized.

To what extent do uneven infrastructural landscapes determine emergent geographies of technological networks and financial investment, state subsidies and NGO activity, securitization and surveillance? How can scholars of media and communication better attend to the confluence of media, energy, resources, politics, and infrastructure? This panel grapples with these complex intersections, framing media and communication not in terms of just producers, texts, and audiences, but as an embedded condition of being—an infrastructural condition.

This diverse panel takes up Kumar and Parameswaran’s (2018) appeal to produce nuanced neocolonial studies to reveal their role in producing new, “chameleon” practices of power. The papers interrogate how neocolonial and neoliberal pressures impact emerging digital media practices in Africa, Asia and the Americas, to manifest new cultural norms and dynamics. Addressing emerging forms of making, promoting and using digital technologies, these intersectional analyses reveal how existing practices of power rely on colonial values to manifest digital media technologies as a new means to enforce domination.

This panel brings together papers that challenge the idea of popular communication. The panelists, all working at the boundaries of popular communication, will consider not only what it means to consider their work within popular communication, but also what it might mean to position one’s work against popular communication. What does “popular communication” mean in 2019? How can popular communication transcend its self-imposed borders? And how might being “against” popular communication be generative for scholars who care about popular culture?

Parents engage in many practices in a digital world including sharing posts and pictures about their family, monitoring their children’s cell phone use, and using location-tracking technologies. These practices can have implications on relationships within the family and on adolescent autonomy. Through this panel, we will see how families negotiate new norms and expectations of technology use within the family context – setting boundaries, protecting one another, and respecting privacy.

To advance our analysis of large-scale visual data, this panel connects communication research to computer vision, an emerging field in artificial intelligence that trains computers to understand images. Our panel features a diversity of international scholars from eight institutions and various research backgrounds. This panel also covers a variety of computer vision techniques (e.g., convolutional neural network, transfer learning, and cloud APIs) and a wide range of communication topics (e.g., gender stereotypes in news images, visual content in protests, and brand-related content).

Teaching philosophies have become critical job search and annual review components around the world. They represent academics’ beliefs, values, and goals about teaching and learning. Graduate programs spend significantly more time on research than teaching philosophies, which are unique to the person writing it; there are more and less effective ways of showcasing one’s teaching prowess. This workshop provides guidance on crafting a teaching philosophy/portfolio as well as feedback on their current teaching philosophy.

In early 2015 an international group of 17 media and communications researchers joined the 250-strong scholar community that was charged to work on the International Panel on Social Progress (www.ipsp.org), with specific responsibility for writing Chapter 13 on Media and Communications’ contribution to social progress. Modeled on the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, the IPSP reassesses the goal of social progress for the 21st century, with contributions from economists, geographers, philosophers, sociologists, and media and communications researchers. The IPSP’s 450,000-word full report was released online in 2017 and formally published in 2018. This roundtable reflects on the significance of media and communications researchers’ involvement in this major international project and reviews the themes of the report in the light of the dramatic political and social developments of the two years since the report’s completion.

As part of a paradigm shift underway in the habits of photography, this panel recuperates a conception of photography as a public art and offers four examples of aesthetic and political reconfiguration. By reconsidering key targets of the critical discourse—humanism, formalism, mass society, and consumer culture—the papers identify how the critique of media dependency, although an essential critical practice, also produced significant misrecognitions of important resources for public communication.

This panel examines the generative potentials of audience displeasure, dislike, disgust, and anger, broadly contributing to a reorientation of audience studies toward greater consideration of negative affect. Specifically, the panelists address the various points of origin, functions, and cultures around rejection of (and hatred for) media texts, figures, and institutions. The panel extends this inquiry into the productive potentials of “bad” affects to sports fandom, politics and journalism, games studies, and television.

- Data Visualizations’ Semiotics Resources
- Data Visualization Mobilisations
- Data Visualization Experiences
- The Political Significance of Data Visualization

In this panel we present key terms from disparate disciplines that contribute to a comprehensive critical theory of data visualization in society. First, we attend to data visualization histories. Second, we highlight the semiotic resources that enable data visualizations to make meanings. Third, we think about how data visualizations get mobilized, in advocacy and activism. Fourth, we consider how data visualizations are experienced. Finally, we consider the political significance of data visualizations.

Nearly 20 years after Klein published No Logo: Taking Aim at the Brand Bullies, we live in a time when everyone is told to be their own brand, corporations insist that they are people, and social movements use the tools of the most advanced marketers. Meanwhile, data about the most intimate details of our daily lives—what we buy, who are friends are, what doctors we visit, what posts we “like” online—are fueling a rapidly expanding frontier of extractive capitalism. This session will be look at the trends that contributed to this blurring of the lines between market and self and its implications for the future.

Join a range of Washington-based musicians, DJs and community activists for a night of music, politics and culture at the Bossa Bistro + Lounge, in the diverse Adams Morgan District. Hosted by ICA members Nikki Usher and Aram Sinnreich (ICA local co-hosts for 2019), and developed with the ICA Urban Issues Planning Committee, the event provides an opportunity to get out of the main hotel site, and be engaged with questions around the role played by music in the local culture and politics, while enjoying music.
from a range of local artists and performers. ICA members may yet do some jamming at the end! Bossa Bistro + Lounge is an Adams Morgan institution, known for its nightly live shows, its Brazilian tapas, and its cutting-edge art. It is a 10-minute walk from the Washington Hilton along Columbia Rd NW, and a 15-minute walk from the Omni Shoreham along Calvert St NW.

Examining four domains—rejection, entrepreneurialism, distraction, and hobbyist production—this panel explores ways that “affective labor” can illuminate the dynamics of contemporary capitalism. It responds to four boundary problematic: (i) its recuperative function that makes it vital for life-processes even as it is commodified, (ii) its encroachment on social relations, especially in kinship, (iii) its blurring of work and non-work, which ensues tensions in the social factory, and (iv) its relationship to embodied temporality.

This panel accepts the challenge suggested by the topic of this conference “Communication beyond boundaries,” by exploring the boundary crossings in political communication: When do discourses on Twitter become uncivil or hateful? When do media diets become rich enough to enable a common ground? How entertaining should political contents be to encourage more political engagement? Is attention to news media related to crossing the frontier between passive attentiveness and partisan action? What differences emerge among several countries, whenever we cross geographical borders?

Shifts in academic and industry environments, alongside transformations in communication ecologies, have facilitated a trend toward more activist communication initiatives, generating new possibilities and responsibilities for practice-based research. This panel features a range of Australian and Aotearoa New Zealand projects that have sought to take advantage of these boundary-crossing trends, through initiatives that contribute to and analyze communication and media interventions. ANZCA researchers reflect on the challenges and opportunities this presents for communication scholarship.

Conceptualizing Boundaries and Membership as Communicative Ordering “Boundary” has been a key construct in communication theorizing about the relationship between work and personal life. Now, however, trends toward more flexible, post-bureaucratic organizational forms point toward the problematic nature of the work-nonwork distinction even as it remains a meaningful and important construct for many. This panel features current theorizing and empirical research on the multi-dimensionality of boundary experiences and the diverse ways in which individuals in post-bureaucratic settings manage organizational inclusion.

This panel addresses the conference theme by exploring how current technology policy research crosses theoretical and methodological boundaries. Panel members consider a central paradox: despite the benefits of communication technology in the lives of marginalized populations, too often the policies influencing how technology is designed and deployed disenfranchise vulnerable individuals. The panelists rely on qualitative methods and critical theoretical perspectives to examine the ways in which technology policies inadvertently compound myriad inequalities in society.

Amidst the drastic reorganization of global power and the viral spread of populist politics, it seems national borders suddenly matter again. But for scholars who kept their eyes trained on the articulation of nationhood over time and space, the nation never ceased to be meaningful. Papers on this panel investigate how popular media is “nationalized” in this contentious era. We identify symbolic systems by which boundaries and borders are emphasized, emphasizing inclusion and exclusion.

Social Media Data as a Window on Disinformation Campaign Strategies

Svenja Boberg, U of Münster, GERMANY
Tim Schatto-Eckrodt, U of Münster, GERMANY
Florian Wintterlin, U of Münster, GERMANY
Thorsten Quandt, U of Münster, GERMANY

In the face of current conditions fundamental communication-related rights are under increasing threat. This IAMCR panel considers how communication may facilitate human connection, understanding and mutual respect in the face of the ever-increasing technological nature of the media and geopolitical turbulence. Participants re-evaluate human dignity in respect of geopolitics, new dynamics of transparency, accessibility and discrimination, and the re-composition of power, media, and technology across boundaries that striate interconnection.

Current forms of affective movements and emotional public expressions as means of political communication have led to a new debate on affect and emotion in public discourse. Considering emotions not (only) as threat but integral part of communication, this panel explores the vital role of journalism within these affective publics. Affects and emotions in journalism are theoretically conceptualized and empirically explored using different methodological approaches and reflecting its limitations.

Chair
Rebecca Jones, Oakland U, USA
Our panel cuts across five different contexts: fictional television, politics, academia, celebrity culture, and journalism, and spans three continents: from Korea to Colombia to the United States. Together, we contribute to the myriad ways in which #MeToo has become much more than just a hashtag, but a movement worthy of inquiry by the international community of feminist scholarship.

Whereas water supply and river basin management plans in general are highly complex issues, mostly discussed and decided on a (trans)national level, local commitment, issue awareness and stakeholder involvement are needed to implement related policies. Here, local communities and social media offer new ways to simplify environmental issues, put them in a (hyper)local context and create a communication space to foster community engagement and offer new ways to lure the “Not-in-my-backyard”-NIMBYs out of their passivity.
The fishbowl conversation puts the role of social media as enabler and/or barrier for local community engagement and activism and the role of social media in environmental issues up for critical discussion.

In a panel at the 2018 ICA conference in Prague, a group of communication and technology scholars presented their views on how rapid developments in media and communication technologies, such as AI, the Internet of Things, mobile computing, and virtual and augmented realities, are challenging our fundamental assumptions about mediation and mediated-communication. The proposed 2019 panel aims to build on the momentum generated by the discussions from the previous year by further exploring some of the most urgent metatheoretical questions. It will follow a roundtable format. Each panelist will give an 8–10 minute presentation followed by an open discussion.

Rethinking East and West Thirty Years after the Fall of the Berlin Wall

Global Communication and Social Change

Chair
- Aswin Punathambekar, U of Michigan, USA
On the thirtieth anniversary of the fall of Berlin Wall, as the liberal world order is crumbling, this panel hopes to reassess the divisions between East and West and what they mean for the future of media and democracy. Panelists’ expertise, covering India, Eastern and Western Europe, Russia, China, Latin America, Zimbabwe and the U.S., presents a truly global overview of the shifting East-West dichotomy and its implications for global communication and the survival of liberal democracy.

Inspired by the 30th anniversary of the end of Cold War, this panel will discuss public diplomacy through the prism of the “New” Cold War perspective to make sense of the contemporary trends in practice, as well as emerging avenues for its examination. By considering the past European and regional experiences with propaganda during the Cold War era, this panel session will problematize the latest developments in public diplomacy theory and practice.

When does engagement cross the boundary to the dark side and become negative engagement? This interdivisional, international panel looks at negative engagement on 5 complimentary levels: societies, cities, organizations, influencers and individuals. Starting with a categorization and definition of negative engagement, we present approaches and examples of negative engagement moving from the abstract levels to the individual concrete examples to make sense of the emerging phenomenon from the point of view of communication.

Cheating the Game Industry: Autonomy and Play with Unity Game Engine
The culture industries are undergoing widespread platformization as major tech companies like Google, Apple, and Facebook reconfigure processes of cultural production, distribution, monetization, and reception. While these tech behemoths seem omnipotent, creative independence is still pursued and brokered in the current platform ecosystem. This panel explores platform autonomy across particular fields of cultural production: music, lifestyle content, game production, public television, and journalism. Together, these five cases show how cultural producers counteract and even evade platform business models, infrastructures, and governance frameworks.

This panel considers the relevance of political theorist Cedric Robinson on contemporary debates about media power and mediatized transformation in an era structured by neo-liberal economic inequality and the rise of ethno-nationalism and white supremacy. Robinson’s magnum opus, Black Marxism: The Making of a Black Radical Tradition, published in 1983 and largely overlooked in the decades following its publication, has found a new resonance in scholarly and popular discussions.
As it blurs the conceptual boundaries of what constitutes journalism, native advertising is also divided by varying academic disciplines and methods to study it. This panel session will bridge these boundaries by focusing on important theoretical, methodological, and practical considerations as it relates to furthering the study of native advertising within journalism, while also including ongoing research into the production of native content from both journalism and advertising practitioner perspectives.

Blue Sky Workshop: Cloudy with Little Chance of Data: Conducting Social Media Research in the Post-API Age

Sponsored Sessions
Tenleytown East (Washington Hilton, First Floor)
Chairs
Marco Bastos, City, U of London, UNITED KINGDOM
Dan Mercea, City, U of London, UNITED KINGDOM
Shawn Walker, Arizona State U, USA

Scholars continue to discuss and refine the challenges related to social media research, but the core challenges remain the same: data access, ethics, and research quality. These issues are even more urgent as social media platforms lock-down access to data, thus locking researchers out and rendering existing methods such as API-based data collection useless. In this workshop, we will discuss the future of social media research and how we can develop solutions to these challenges.

Democracies around the globe are challenged by a recent wave of ultra right-wing, religious or ideological campaigns applying a range of online disinformation strategies. In sync to these developments, established information sources and societal institutions are criticized for spreading misleading information or “fake news.” Given the societal relevance of the issues, it is essential to organize the debate, and to conceptually and empirically advance it beyond the current status quo.

Rethinking “Code is Law”: on the Blurry Boundaries between Code and Law in E-Discovery

Drawing from high-stakes contexts, this panel explores changing boundary conditions in communication practice and scholarship: in scholar/artist/property divides, commodity forms and non-commodification, between fieldworkers and communities, between writing and other modes of scholarly expression, and shifting boundaries between law and code in legal practice. Our goal is not “getting out of our silos” but to witness and theorize boundary formation and deformation in context, reconnecting to projects and constituencies in newly creative ways.

Parents continue to monitor, mediate, and model media use in the lives of their children. As socializing agents, parents, grandparents, caregivers, and teachers shape the development of youth. This high-density panel examines how parents and grandparents navigate the media world with their children and grandchildren and also how these socializing figures are depicted in televised narratives. From co-playing to restrictive mediation, parents and grandparents stay afloat in the media saturated world of their children.

A museum exhibit is a wrap-around communicative environment, immersing visitors in a textured, multimodal message. What kind of message? This panel features researchers at the borders of communication studies and museology. What they have in common is their recognition of museum exhibitions as a powerful social force. Millions of museum visitors encounter exhibitions that inform, entertain, but also inspire, enrage and mobilize.

The nationalist politics of the Trump era has raised the global stakes for communication scholarship. From U.S. produced television to social media, the panelists tackle the ideological inheritances and contemporary representational conditions that define the contemporary moment of profound nationalist tensions. Together the panelists examine the role of digital, visual, and sonic popular communication in reinforcing and disrupting the Western ethnic, racial, heteronormative norms that inform popular narratives and how audiences create spaces of interpretative resistance.

The field of mediated distant suffering has rapidly evolved and is increasingly paying attention to the complex reactions of media audience to humanitarian crisis. This panel aims to integrate the findings and map the next steps for the upcoming decade. We propose three boundaries that need to be pushed: disciplinary integration, expansion to new media ecologies and new social domains, and elaboration of research designs. Four high-density presentations are followed by a roundtable.

What happens in modern sports entertainment is greatly informed by, and informing, what happens in contemporary politics. This panel explores the different intersections between politics and sports entertainment by examining how different wrestlers, companies, and texts embody these intersections. Coming from different theoretical perspectives, the panelists analyze pro-wrestling actors and texts to understand how political issues influence what wrestlers and wrestling companies do and say, and how professional wrestling shapes contemporary political actors and discourses.

In an era of polarized politics, concern about filter bubbles, ideological cocoons and Daily Me’s has led to a resurgence of research on selective exposure. Citizens purposefully unaware of the views and concerns of others threaten a vibrant public sphere and the prospect of political civility. This panel explores whether widely used experimental designs may have misrepresented the psychology of selectivity and may have misconstrued differences in framing and interpretation as lack of exposure.

Scholars concerned with “infrastructure studies” note that all media require infrastructure, yet the apparent invisibility of these socio-technical assemblages often masks the politics that undergird them. This panel draws on a multiplicity of approaches to infrastructure to examine different historical moments and comparative social contexts for infrastructures that remain understudied, including embodiment, consumer debt, non-Western cases, and constructions of technological “smartness.”

The Pink Tide in Crisis: Media, Politics, and Instability in Contemporary Latin America
Global Communication and Social Change

Sunday
14:00–15:15
Columbia 7
(Philadelphia Hilton, Terrace Level)

Chair
Stuart Davis, City U of New York, Baruch College, USA
The idea for this panel came from a group of researchers who collaborated on a collection entitled The Pink Tide: Media and Political Power in Latin America (2017). Given the rapidly deteriorating situations in the “Pink Tide” nations (including the embattlement of the Maduro regime in Venezuela and the rise of fascist demagoguery in Brazil), this panel seeks to mobilize more recent field research to address the role of media production and dissemination in these larger political, economic, and representational difficulties.

Crisis and controversies involve political, moral and economic issues, social concerns, science and technology knowledge and lead to situations dealing with disruptive events regarding their temporalities. Therefore, researchers in the Communication field have to cope with an interdisciplinary-oriented approach and with the dynamics of social groups. Instead of a rather binary opposition between “in” and “out”, crisis and controversies bring insights passing and sometimes smuggling through boundaries to be explored.

In the twenty-first century, how do corporations use media and popular communication to engage in public-facing corporate-benevolence projects? In providing answers to this question, panelists examine various promotional, public relations, and popular media initiatives that position the corporation as a self-professed “global” brand or institution. At stake is the question of how powerful institutions shape popular conceptualizations of “the global” and how such ideas are informed by these institutions’ usually profit-driven goals.

Given the importance of media literacy education for everyday life, for policy formation, and for both formal and informal K–12 schooling, there is great potential for CAM scholars and practitioners to make a meaningful real-world impact. This Blue Sky workshop aims to provide an open forum for discussion about the ways media scholars can engage the public in media literacy education at family, school and policy levels in different social and cultural contexts.

This panel invigorates scholarly discussion on how K-pop as a cultural window has encouraged young people in the world to cross their geographic, socio-cultural, and linguistic boundaries in the consumption of popular culture. Based on audience studies in four different cities in the U.S., France, Chile, and on the US-Mexico border alongside the evolution of K-pop, this panel explores fundamental transformations in the celebrity-fan relationship and cultural flows on a global scale.

White evangelicals overwhelmingly voted for Trump and continue to provide him with unwavering support. This political alliance is bound up with a Protestant “culture industry” that has evolved in recent decades in tandem with neoliberalism. Drawing from specific case studies, the speakers on this panel will consider how the tension between religious piety and the demands of the market animates Protestant cultural production under neoliberalism, and how this dynamic signals both political peril and promise.

This panel considers sports media’s construction and dissemination of diverse identities as marketable products within brand culture. Specifically, we examine how and why sports media and sports associations commodify diverse identities and what this means for the broader cultural projects of multiculturalism and progressivism. We place the subfields of critical consumer studies, sports media, and communication in conversation to better articulate the identity politics at play within contemporary sports media brands.

Since the advent of Tinder in 2012, dating apps have grown increasingly popular. So far, the majority of dating app research has unraveled why people use dating apps and whether dating app use is associated with having casual sex. However, we argue that the affordances of dating apps exceed merely the sexual. In this panel, we explore the myriad ways that dating apps might not only influence interpersonal processes, but also social and cultural phenomena.

The notion that political communications operates as a system of interacting components has moved to the center of the field, often represented by the key phrases of “hybrid media system” and “communication ecology.” These epistemological orientations have obvious appeal for observers of the complexity and interconnectedness of contemporary information flows. This panel addresses fundamental theoretical and empirical questions needed to develop this research area.

The panel aims to save the opinion leadership concept from retirement (cf. Katz & Fialkoff, 2017) by stimulating and synthesizing discourse in which ways opinion leadership is crucial to our understanding of communication in the new media age. For this aim, the international panel of four researchers will present a variety of fresh theoretical and methodological perspectives indicating how to understand and redefine opinion leaders, their influence, and the flow of information in the digital age.

Armed conflicts, occupation by a foreign state, or tightening regimes heavily impact the work of media organizations, pushing journalists to leave their countries under the risk of imprisonment or death. The panel gathers researchers and practicing journalists to provide an interdisciplinary analysis of exiled media as it challenges geopolitical, cultural, and infrastructural borders, professional boundaries and journalistic standards.

CAM’s Research Escalator session is a special session designed to provide scholars an opportunity for less-developed research to be presented and discussed (with the goal of making the paper ready for submission to a conference or journal) with experts in the field. During the session, submitters will meet with their assigned mentors in one-on-one mentorship meetings to discuss their feedback on a working manuscript.

Intended as a community-based proclamation of the resilience demonstrated by African American women who thrive amidst oppression, Black Girl Magic has since been repurposed and misappropriated. This panel explores how such a presumably positive media framework narrows the scope of Black womanhood and how Black women subvert it. Panelists use feminist theory to critique patterns in representation across content genres (e.g., news, entertainment, and self-help) and media platforms (e.g., film, television, and social media).

This Blue Sky Workshop will provide an open forum for discussion about how to achieve and maintain work-life balance in academia. It will also touch upon the potential mental health challenges resulting from a lack of work-life balance and the resources available to young scholars experiencing these issues. This session aims to participate in the prevention of mental health issues arising from a lack of work-life balance by developing a set of best practices and encouraging discussion of this topic within ICA’s Early Career Community. We welcome all students and early-career scholars to come share their work-life balance experience (or lack thereof), the challenges they face (or have faced) with lacking work-life balance or trying to implement it in their academic lives and more generally the way they deal with the topics of work-life balance, mental health issues and mindfulness within their academic cultures.

This panel addresses the issues raised by Chakravartty et al.’s (2018) “#CommunicationSoWhite” Journal of Communication article as they pertain more specifically to studies of communication and technology. There will be a #CommunicationSoWhite pre-conference and a more general #CommunicationSoWhite panel in the main conference led by Paula Chakravartty and Charlton McIwain, two of the co-authors of the “#CommunicationSoWhite” article, so another goal for this panel is to tie to conversations in those other two venues.

Creating Visibility- the Case of Comunicar
María Soledad Ramírez Montoya, Tecnologico de Monterrey, MEXICO |

Media and communication studies suffer from a vast invisibility of certain geographical, epistemological and ontological perspectives. In this roundtable, we bring together scholars and academic publishers to discuss and problematize the tendency in our field toward a “monoculture of knowledge making” (de Sousa Santos, 2016, p. 5). Drawing on the case of the invisibility of Latin American scholarship (Ganter & Ortega, forthcoming), we explore the question of why de-Westernization is still more of a challenge rather than a mission accomplished. Furthermore, we discuss different models for potential solutions for creating enhanced visibility, dialogue, and engagement.

This panel explores strategies for conducting feminist and queer scholarship that challenges dominant norms of game studies. These papers center new or previously undervalued sources: queer women of color feminists, canonical game studies texts re-interpreted through queer lenses, visualization software, and casual video games. In the present moment, as the toxicity of gamer culture seeps into academia, approaching the study of games through radical, intersectional feminist and queer perspectives is more crucial than ever.

Van Ness
(Washington Hilton, First Floor)

Chair
Dietram Scheufele, U of Wisconsin-Madison, USA

Respondents
Jennifer Heimberg, National Academies of Sciences, Engineering, and Medicine, USA

The National Academies of Sciences, Engineering, and Medicine has produced a report that assesses research and data reproducibility and replicability issues across science and engineering and considers how this bears on public trust in science. The report makes recommendations for improving rigor and transparency in scientific and engineering research. This roundtable will discuss how the report’s recommendations relate to science communication and public understanding of science.

In celebrating the centennial of Schenck v. United States, the landmark case of the U.S. Supreme Court on freedom of political speech, in 2019, four leading experts on free speech will consider how Americans’ 100-year experiment with more free speech, not less, has fared at home and globally. Instead of all the possible free-speech issues, our panel will pay critical attention to four select areas: defamation, privacy, freedom of information, and the journalist’s privilege (also called “shield laws”).

This ICA theme session brings together an international group of boundary-crossing researchers and scholar-activists who are engaged in media projects aimed at amplifying research-informed work on sexuality. Panelists do this by blogging, podcasting and writing in popular media outlets. As more and more universities call on faculty to demonstrate scholarly impact beyond traditional academic publishing modalities, the practice of communicating across established boundaries and research domains warrants critical discussion and engagement.

Media literacy incorporates the ability to access, analyze, evaluate and create media and stretches across different media platforms as well. Critical thinking serves as a cornerstone for media literacy and can be used to recognize gender stereotypes, persuasion, and much more. In this panel, scholars explore the learning of digital skills, gender stereotypes, and advertising strategies and also consider tools to measure and conceptualize media literacy for future research.

What makes a media market? This panel presents a number of case studies to interrogate how markets materialize and become naturalized in everyday practices, policies, and culture. This panel crosses social, political, and cultural conceptions to arrive at a critical understanding of “the market” as a contested discursive space. Given the many political and economic challenges facing democratic societies across the globe today, scrutinizing the politics of market construction is an exceedingly timely endeavor.

This panel presents senior and emerging scholars talking about the evolution, contemporary drifts, and promising trends in health communication. Panelists will cover topics such as: translational research, genetics, cross-national data tracking, politics, policy and advocacy, informatics, and geopolitics. The panel builds on issues identified in a 2014 “Emerging Issues and Future Trends” Health Communication article. It also highlights how the interdisciplinary impetus of health communication creates boundary-crossings within and beyond the discipline.

“Give Us Your Best Shot”: Museums and Visitor Photo-Taking Practices
- Caitlin Dyche, U of Michigan, USA
In museums, the visual is closely associated with representation. For instance, an art work might depict its subject matter, or the inner state of the artist. In science museums, exhibits portray natural phenomena, while past events are recounted in history museums. These 6 papers, straddling the boundaries of visual communication and museum studies, challenge “the descriptive fallacy” about exhibits. Visual elements and affordances perform, evoke, persuade, scold, and indoctrinate, in addition to represent.

This workshop invites scholars at the fulcrum of deliberations on the “global” in media and communication networks. We will critically examine alternative frameworks to reconfigure our understandings of how global media platforms are organizing the power relations in society. We delve into methodological and conceptual innovations on the dialect between digital cultures and the global. This workshop re-examines dominant formulations of information/media systems, and critically assesses boundary crossings in this platform era.

Over the past decade, scholars have paid increasing attention to the growing role of digital technologies in the gig economy. While there has been substantial empirical work on the topic, fewer integrated theoretical efforts have emerged. This panel brings together scholars currently studying the gig economy through distinct theoretical frameworks and disciplinary lenses to explore the complex interplay between digital platforms and employment structures. It proposes new avenues for theory and critique.

Media industries “imagine” who their audiences are, and those imaginings drive real decisions of development, production, and investment. But the study of media industries would also benefit from looking more closely at the reverse: what imaginings do audiences and users have of the media industries? This panel of researchers at the intersection of media industry and audience/user studies explores the ways understandings of audiences’ “imagined industries” can contribute to media industry studies.

The scholars on this panel elucidate the limits and possibilities of black and queer television through examinations of its producers, stories, and the audiences who consume it. By looking at a specific kind of representation in black queerness, this panel proposes that any comprehensive understanding of television must consist of the entire scope of story development and focus on how specific communities are impacted by economic, technological, social, and cultural factors.

There are highly visible and continuing trends to push the boundaries of intercultural communication sustained by the historical legacy of what white heterosexual middle-upper class U.S. Americans know about The Others. This paper panel joins such genealogy to push, mix, and cross the boundaries of intercultural communication. The presenters are interested in seeking possibilities for the future as they reconsider the complexity, fluidity, and relevance of intercultural communication.

This panel addresses an underexplored perspective in media and communication studies, that of the politics of memory in the making and un-making of boundaries. We discuss how histories of the past, social memory, and forgetting are used to produce symbolic or physical boundaries. We also discuss how sensitivities to temporality can be a critical means of thinking beyond boundaries, and how an engagement with memory could be a means to imagining alternative futures.

This panel investigates the role of the Internet’s distribution infrastructures in user building and the economic and political institutions that enable them. Four studies in turn explore this topic at the levels of the interorganizational field, rentiers of physical communications networks, website construction, and the user interface. Drawing from software and infrastructure studies, audience research, and institutional political economy, the studies utilize diverse data sources including historical archives, institutional reports, interviews, and commercial web traffic data.

What is Journalism Studies Research for?
Rasmus Kleis Nielsen, Reuters Institute for the Study of Journalism, UNITED KINGDOM

Journalism Studies research has much to offer, but far too often remains disconnected from the practice of journalism and the public at large. In keeping with the division’s increased interest in public engagement and taking advantage of Washington-based expertise, we offer a panel to discuss the role that scholars should play—speaking up and speaking out—and bring outside voices from a research center, a think tank/funder, and a leading international newspaper.

Smartphones and social media present multiple opportunities for social engagement for adolescents on a daily basis. We are beginning to know some of these implications on the lives of youth and continually seek new methods and new approaches to better understand digital technology use among teens. This panel offers innovative approaches for gathering and sharing digital experiences and voices through technology and provides evidence regarding cyber aggression and risky selfie behaviors among teens.

This panel presents findings about ways communication is used in the online sphere to transgress democratic norms and practices across three national contexts: Brazil, Germany, and the United States. Paper topics include extremism, hate speech, “fake news,” and incivility. Presentations showcase the local effects of “globalized” behaviors often presented as unified and monolithic because they are practiced through online media. The panel’s composition is uniquely balanced between presentations using computational “science” and critical-cultural “studies” methods.

This workshop will foster discussion about current concerns related to cross-boundary research strategies and methods employed to investigate communication phenomena that require data collection in international/intercultural contexts. The purpose of this workshop is to generate diversity of thought and critical reflection about data quality within post-positivistic and interpretive paradigms and within qualitative, quantitative, and mixed-method approaches. Further, this workshop will examine trends in both academic and government-directed research to provide best practices for testing hypotheses and developing theories while minimizing data collection errors and preserving analytical objectivity amid the challenges of international and cross-sociocultural research. This workshop will interest those who study international communication, intercultural communication, public diplomacy, nation branding, political communication, and global media as well as regional studies.

This roundtable examines the status of the concept of “the political” in critical communication research, particularly as it pertains to the ruptures and volatility of the current political and media environment. It reflects on the value of post-foundational, radical democratic and critical realist theoretical perspectives in a historical moment where the logic of the political has primarily returned in the form of an authoritarian and reactionary challenge to liberal democratic norms.

In this closing discussion we want to engage in a conversation about the future of news media, old and new, covering a number of areas. First, the web and “free information” undermined the long-standing business models of the news media of combined advertising and consumer revenues, pushing news media to try all kinds of alternative funding: digital subscriptions, selling readers’ “big data.” The growth of initiatives such as BuzzFeed and Huffington Post showed real promise for the future of news media. However, recent lay-offs suggest a bleaker reality. So, what can and should a viable future for news media look like? Does it mean going back to a 19th century type of business model as The Atlantic recently suggested? Second, fake news is an umbrella and a buzz term and should be used with caution. Still, the widespread dissemination of disinformation has dealt a blow to the self-evident position of news and journalism as the fourth estate in democratic societies—a blow that seems fundamental and irrevocable. What is the future of news content and of information in a media environment where the relationships between information/facts and news, between news and truth claims have been undermined? Third, how can we guarantee quality journalism in such a context: i.e., what area do we need to focus on to find a solution? Is it about the ethics of news production where stories get triggered by dynamics like journalists getting sucked into the Twitter rabbit hole? Is it about the quality of the information in an era of hyper immediacy? Is it the political context that pushes for polarized/polarizing news? Or is it about audiences feeling comfortable in their echo chambers and cynical about science and “objective” facts? Finally, what happened to efforts to create more diverse newsrooms? Studies show a persistent under-representation of certain groups, even after many efforts to rectify this. Does it even matter in a gig economy where newsrooms are small and most of the content is produced by “freelance” workers paid (very little) per piece?

Questions about persuasion, disinformation and “fake news” have been in the forefront of public discussion since 2016. This panel examines a range of historical examples for widespread false news stories around the world, demonstrating the variety of factors that impact perceptions on trustworthiness. Panelists will address commonalities and differences between these historical examples and current developments, emphasizing their relevant contributions for understanding the dynamics of disinformation and trust today.

Raymond Williams’ legacy of “cultural materialism” provides a way to analyze political economic, cultural, mental, and social aspects of communication. While at present these processes have taken a transnational character, the implications of this concept for a critical global perspective remain largely unexplored. This panel investigates how Williams’ concepts can be made productive for critical inquiries in global media studies from several vantage points: community, mobility, the formation of the subject, and the attention economy.

Social groups traditionally denied representation through mainstream media have used social media and media-centered strategies to call for profound social transformations. Environmental politics have emerged at the center of many of these efforts. Grounded in a review of alternative environmental discourses and case studies from the Global South, and engaging questions tied to voice and recognition, this panel considers how different social actors have used media to engender environmental action and challenge the status quo.

Platform Effects: Apps and the Perils of Optimizing Culture
Jeremy Morris, U of Wisconsin-Madison, USA
Through comparative cases of music and software, this panel considers the impact of platformization on the circulation of cultural goods. It considers the ways in which musicians, software developers and other actors are increasingly required to “optimize” cultural goods to make them more visible, spreadable, and sellable on platforms like Spotify and app stores. We argue optimization puts extra pressures on those who produce cultural goods and challenges the agency of users who experience them.

Civic media is any mediated communication that aims to engage communities. This panel portrays five examples where youth produced civic media fostered tolerance, empathy, and social change. Each case study had its own methodology to examine how going beyond the boundaries of your own culture can develop better intercultural communication. As research of civic media is in its infancy, this panel aims to have an engaged conversation about youth’s intercultural experiences creating media messages.

Graduate students encounter numerous challenges posed by the intersection of the various roles they are called upon to uphold. Learning to navigate and effectively communicate across the boundaries of each role poses a unique challenge for these students because experience and identity have not yet had time to fully take root. Therefore, graduate students face unique trials in their efforts to maintain a sense of self that must be explored.

Activist Journalism: Newsgathering as Social Justice Advocacy

Activism, Communication and Social Justice

Tuesday
14:00–15:15
Tenleytown East (Washington)

Chairs
Urszula Pruchniewska, Temple U, USA
For decades, activists have created radical media to mobilize allies and promote political organizing, but they are increasingly using journalistic practices such as interviews, documentary filmmaking, and publishing via social media to produce and disseminate this content. This panel discusses how activists’ use of journalistic practices puts pressure on and challenges the journalistic field, which raises interesting questions about defining journalism, what it means to be a journalist, and how one “does journalism.”

How do “different” sorts of entities become interlocutors, participants in communicative exchange? Taking as axiomatic that human and non-human entities are bound up together in different but equally consequential ways, this panel interrogates communication across constructed boundaries of difference, especially the so-called human and non-human, the animal and the machine. The panel troubles these boundaries, exploring how digital media are implicated in the interplay of intimacy, engagement, and detachment by human and non-human entities (algorithms, laboratory animals, and “natural” specimens).

In this panel, we examine the ways that “dark play” (Schechner, 1995) might be brought to bear to examine a variety of phenomena online, from games to Reddit to YouTube. We engage critically with the concept in an effort to develop a more cohesive and theoretically rich understanding of dark play, and argue that this kind of play is critical to understanding contemporary media and this political moment.

This panel centralizes the role of communication in coping with macro- and micro-level concerns in the context of reproductive health. Researchers from multiple universities will investigate information management about reproductive health, infertility, unintended pregnancy, egg donation, and pre-implantation genetic diagnosis. Rather than implying communication, the panel focuses on issues that are fundamentally communicative in nature, including communication technology, media literacy, decision-making, supportive communication, interaction goals, relational quality, uncertainty, identity, and coping behaviors.

The concept of post-normal science communication is useful for better understanding the recent changes and challenges that science communication is facing. Using different methodological approaches, we look at post-normal science communication by examining post-normal situations with high levels of uncertainties, value questions, urgency to take action, a dramatically changing media environment, and the polarizing discourse cultures. Among the consequences of post-normal science communication are the blurring and renegotiation of the boundaries between science and journalism.

The importance of adapting measurements and assessments to cultures for validity is becoming increasingly clearer to scholars. As our statistical and psychometric knowledge grows, so too does our ability to accurately assess communication phenomena. During this discussion panel, researchers will share struggles with measurement and assessment adaptations, including both stories of success and failure, leading to practical implications for developing culturally adaptive, valid measurement.

8:30–18:00

OMNI HOTEL:

Calvert Room (Omni Shoreham Hotel, Lobby Level)

Chairs

Loes Aaldering, U of Vienna, AUSTRIA

Daphne van der Pas, U of Amsterdam, NETHERLANDS

The goal of this postconference is to discuss relevant and interesting research on the intersection of gender, politics and communication, that helps us understand whether there are, and if so why there are, gender differences in media coverage and candidate communication in the political world. We welcome both theoretical and empirical papers and we would like to bring together qualitative and quantitative researchers, employing experimental designs, interviews, content analysis, survey studies or other relevant methods.

Conceptions of privacy hold deep, cultural underpinnings, yet these dimensions are often underexplored in research that tends to focus on how privacy is valued, measured, and enacted. The ultimate goal of this workshop will be to initiate discussion and working groups on the ways in which systematic, comparative, cross-cultural analyses of privacy might be conceptualized, theorized, and operationalized across cultural, political, and/or geographic dimensions, in ways that are both novel and authentic.

This postconference builds on two years of informal social gatherings convened at ICA to build fellowship and exchange professionalism tactics among those who gender-identify as female and have completed their PhD. In the wake of #metoo, the unique needs of female scholars in their promotion and career success merit careful consideration. The postconference will provide panels with skill-building in public engagement (media training and social media strategy), academic promotion, and field assessments of senior female scholars.
