As AI-based technologies continuously transform the media ecosystem, an increasing need exists for a regulatory framework promoting human-centric AI with shared values. Accordingly, the need to discuss new regulations promoting public values such as transparency, authenticity, and diversity is critical to empower communities worldwide. This preconference aims to bridge the gap between regulatory proposals and communication research through direct exchanges with policy leaders and by operationalizing and discussing concrete suggestions to develop human-centric systems.

Advancing open and collaborative research practices in communication is contingent upon sharing tools, ideas, skills, and data across a disparate collection of subfields. Although conferences and workshops are undoubtedly beneficial for pursuing these goals, they rarely afford the unstructured time and hands-on collaboration required to fully realize their potential for catalyzing new connections and research collaborations.

Nothing about Us, without Us: Authentic Engagement with Persistently Marginalized/Minoritized Populations in Health Communication Scholarship

Andy Tan, U of Pennsylvania, USA
Lillie Williamson, U of Wisconsin-Madison, USA

This preconference provides a forum for scholars of all levels to exchange ideas around what it means for health communication scholars to authentically collaborate with persistently marginalized communities. It will consist of two panels and group discussions focused on empowering scholars to conduct authentic work committed to health equity. Discussions will revolve around wise-practices for collaborating with communities.

Thanks to support from the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Pennsylvania, we can support the registration of up to ten students. Please contact the organizers with your information for a registration code.

This preconference aims to create a dialogue between organizational communication (OC) and public relations (PR) scholars by shifting the locus of enunciation toward Latin America. Unlike Anglo-Saxon perspectives, Latin American approaches to OC and PR have evolved in a constant dialogue, shifting between integration and distinction. We want to make this an opportunity to discuss Latin American approaches to PR, OC, or the interplay between both.

	The broadest perspective to look at communication is to look at it within the context of society and culture. Every act of communication happens within, is affected by, constitutes, reflects, and changes social forms and patterns. What we perceive, how we understand, and how we act are shaped by our cultures. To interact with each other in our global world, we need to be able to define and re-define our understanding of cultures as we evolve and our cultures evolve. To reflect on and improve our understanding of cultures, we need to re-visit the idea that “social and cultural arrangements are loaded to enforce the power of certain stakeholders in ways that dominate and even oppress others” (Littlejohn et al., 2021). The conceptualization of culture itself can fall within such dominant social and cultural arrangements, while simultaneously creating openings for transformation. This preconference interrogates, problematizes, and discusses ways in which we can re-conceptualize culture so that it can remain the broadest and most inclusive possible arrangement, both attending to the interplays of power and creating openings for transformation. This undertaking is especially important in our communication subfields, such as intercultural communication, ethnicity and race studies, discourse studies, diaspora studies, studies that include indigenous communities, transnational mobilities, feminist studies, global communication, popular media, media studies, peace and conflict studies, and so on.

Over the past few years, we have witnessed a variety of global crises ranging from the Covid-19 pandemic and the war in Ukraine to the ongoing specter of environmental and climate change. As organizations encounter these global wicked problems, leaders are increasingly expected to “do the right thing” in navigating, negotiating, or neglecting these crises. This preconference explores the complex communicative processes by which organizations constitute organizational strategies in response to such global crises.

This preconference is fully remote.

PRECONFERENCE: History of Digital Metaphors*Pre/Postconferences*Chairs

Gabriele Balbi, U della Svizzera Italiana, SWITZERLAND
Carlos Scolari, U Pompeu Fabra, SPAIN

This preconference will focus on “digital” metaphors and the ways they have been built and stabilized over time. Digitalization has been explained and has launched several metaphors over time and the ways in which these metaphors have been created and how they mattered in describing digital media are at the center of this preconference. Of course these metaphors have not been invented for the digital realm only but have often been inherited by the past: for example, water metaphors like “channel” have been applied to digital media and, reversely, metaphors created for digital media like the “cloud” can be retrospectively applied to old and analogue technologies.

Stephanie Fox, U de Montréal, CANADA
Kirstie McAllum, U de Montréal, CANADA
Jennifer Ptacek, U of Dayton, USA

This workshop-based preconference will stimulate dialogue about how communication scholars can strengthen the collective resilience of health care workforces, perpetually stretched to their breaking point. Conceptions of resilience must shift from an individual effort or trait to a collective quality that health care teams, organizations, and systems must support and nurture. Communication is key to collective resilience: this preconference aims to brainstorm how organizations can embrace the relationally sustaining dimensions of communicative practices in organizational contexts.

Featuring four world-renowned communication scholars across various subfields: Sarah Banet-Weiser (U of Southern California & U of Pennsylvania), Pablo Boczkowski (Northwestern U), Rajiv Rimal (Johns Hopkins U) and Joseph B. Walther (U of California, Santa Barbara), this special forum will allow us to hear how these leading scholars define authenticity in their respective areas of research, which cover popular media and consumer culture, online/digital news and journalism, health communication and normative influence, and technology-mediated communication; what practical and theoretical significance they think authenticity has in human communication and communication research; how the notion of authenticity can be integrated into future research endeavors to better understand and explain a wide range of communication-related phenomena at individual and societal levels, and so forth. The plenary will include a Land Recognition and brief performance by the Toronto Council Fire, a nonprofit that empowers and educates indigenous youth about indigenous culture.

This Blue Sky workshop will facilitate a larger conversation about the importance of multimodal research, teaching, and publishing in our field. Reflecting on several initiatives that have taken place over the last decade at ICA, we will discuss what, if any, institutional strategies are necessary to support the work of scholars who embrace, practice, and create multimodality. Will the ICA have a role in developing or co-developing guidelines for our field?

There is widespread concern that the world is experiencing a global “information disorder,” often seen as a confluence of a rapidly changing media ecology and an increasingly fractious political environment. This has contributed to decreasing levels of trust in institutions amounting to a “crisis of authenticity.” Drawing on examples from half a dozen countries, this panel explores the geopolitics of authenticity, understood as the interplay between geography, domestic and international politics, and mis- and disinformation.

Panel contributions use qualitative interviews, content analysis, and digital ethnography to study user strategies of incorporating the TikTok algorithm into platform communication, and to examine motivations of forming communities around algorithmically curated TikTok content. This includes discussing linguistic practices and examining covert viral racist messages in regard to content moderation, analyzing mourning communities and spaces of intimacy as follow-up communication to algorithmically curated TikTok content, and adapting practices of news presentation to TikTok’s algorithmic structure.

Journalism studies in locales where democratic traditions are less established engage in questions about survival and autonomy of thought and practice, and are immediately rooted in the historical and social contexts that set boundaries for what is possible for journalists and the public. Thus, on this panel, we consider journalism research about places in which democracy has never been a background luxury, and consider whether this research might provide an authentic path forward for Global North scholarship.

Recent evidence on the state of mental health among academics paints an alarming picture. Faculty members and PhD students around the world run a high risk of developing mental health issues, including anxiety, depression, and burnout, at some point in their career. The structural conditions of academic work, such as high publication pressure, fierce competition, and a culture of constant evaluation, may well contribute to the problem; and the pandemic has clearly intensified it. Based on evidence from a 2022 online survey of over 1000 media and communication scholars from around the world, this panel invites panelists to discuss implications and possible ways to improve the situation from the perspectives of early career and more senior scholars with extensive management experience.

This panel explores how media literacy practices can help students and news consumers of all ages evaluate authenticity of sources through personal inquiry. Issues of access, personal bias, and narrative techniques—among others—all impact how we perceive messages and the people behind those messages. What’s more, young people are apt to conflate truth with authenticity. Panel experts will frame the challenges ahead and strategies for success in helping young people understand and evaluate authenticity in digital media.

In recent years, a lot of conversations have occurred in (in)formal settings to discuss the (dis)advantages of peer review in scholarly publications. Despite many criticisms against the peer review mechanism, it remains an important and indispensable component of scholarly publication for the foreseeable future. This workshop aims to bring a group of active scholars at different career stages in the field to share their personal and professional experiences as authors, reviewers, and editors of (un)published manuscripts. The goals of this workshop are two-fold: (1) de-mystifying the peer review and editorial decision processes for junior scholars; and (2) starting our initiative to (re)build a healthy and sustainable publication culture that will benefit all stakeholders in our scientific community.

In recent years, Amazon.com has disrupted the creation, distribution, and monetization of media industries ranging from book publishing to movies to television to advertising. The sheer scope of Amazon's involvement in previously distinct media industries makes it challenging to analyze larger cross-industry patterns fostered by the world's largest retailer. This panel explores Amazon's impact within and across media industries, fostering broader conversations about one company's outsized influence shaping how culture is created, distributed, and commoditized.

This cross-disciplinary panel aims to present innovative methodological frameworks in authenticity and disinformation studies, specifically focusing on repressive contexts such as Russia, China, Iran and transnational digital repressions. The objective of this panel is to discuss how interdisciplinary and intersectional perspectives can help to grasp new forms of disinformation and reclaim authenticity in communications. The panel is organized as a dialogue between quantitative and qualitative approaches and also explores potentials of OSINT and digital forensics. Beyond the classical paper session, this panel encourages dialogue with the audience and welcomes early career scholars and researchers who experiment with methodologies and tools.

Recently, the concept of mindfulness has received increasing attention. In communications, however, research considering the concept is scarce. This panel offers a deepening of previous and a widening of possible research from the perspective of mobile communication. We will present empirical studies examining the role of mindfulness in mobile media use as well as a scoping review of existing (mobile) communication research on mindfulness, aiming to discuss connecting points between the concept and studying communication.

In February 2022, Russia launched its war on Ukraine. This panel includes papers that examine the impact of the war in Ukraine on Public Diplomacy scholarship. Specifically, the panel explores the agenda setting activities of different actors embroiled in the war. Studies examine Ukraine's attempt to manage its national image, Russia's strategic communications in foreign countries, how Russian media channels legitimized the war, and nations' attempts to frame their policies vis-à-vis Ukrainian refugees.

Promotional industries and practices span the globe, yet most scholarship focuses on the global north and west. The papers in this panel address the challenge of de-westernizing/decolonizing the field by re-imagining promotion through “theorizing from contexts.” Shifting attention away from the academy and toward global praxis, they challenge normative ideas of promotion, reveal its reality as lived experience in and through media and popular culture, as subjugation and violence, but also resistance and empowerment.

This roundtable animates new directions in scholarship on the relationships between race and media theories. Centered around three new books that grapple with the histories, memories, and legacies of colonialism and slavery in contemporary visual and digital culture, six authors and critics discuss how racial logics of liberal modernity continue to undergird the field and how we may push communication theory beyond the western conception of man toward a broader horizon of freedom and justice.

This panel explores the extent to which campaign communication is polarized by bringing together empirical insights on political actors' social media strategies from different regions of the world. The studies span Ibero-America, the Balkans, and Central-Eastern Europe, which are geographic areas underexplored in the existing literature. While the question of polarized communication is approached from different angles, each presentation has a strong comparative interest supported by a shared research design.

Unanticipated consequences often occur when researchers position themselves in the public eye using knowledge mobilization strategies. The online tools that afford research communication also enable antisocial behavior.

This session seeks to:

1. Identify the challenges for scholarly knowledge mobilization in the face of potential antisocial responses;
2. Provide an opportunity for participants to share their experiences with knowledge mobilization and antisocial behavior; and
3. Develop strategies to address online antisocial behavior and misinformation resulting from their public scholarship.

Critical communication research matters. Communication scholarship is beginning a much-needed shift toward more inclusivity and equality. Understanding how we engage in our research is an essential way to navigate and strengthen the value of our scholarship. This panel seeks to contribute to transforming how we prepare, engage, and read communication research methods by inviting new and innovative perspectives that question the status quo and push the boundaries of knowledge production. It pushes for theoretical and methodological innovation toward more epistemic justice.

From the recording industry's beginnings, formats and platforms of music distribution have played into judgments about the authenticity of communication between musicians and listeners. As streaming and social media have usurped traditional modes of music distribution, the locus of concerns about authenticity has shifted accordingly. Contributors to this panel will consider how enduring questions of trustworthiness and realness have reemerged across a variety of streaming platforms and practices.

The Association for Education in Journalism and Mass Communication (AEJMC) strives to help instructors of media and communication excel in teaching, research, and service. One of the recent initiatives that AEJMC is focusing on is the importance of undergraduate research on college campuses. Research, teaching, and liberal arts colleges are prioritizing student research courses and assistantships. This panel explores ways faculty can support student research initiatives at the undergraduate level that feed into graduate-level programs.

Chairs

Yea-Wen Chen, San Diego State U, USA
Srividya Ramasubramanian, Syracuse U, USA

In this workshop, we offer action-oriented steps building upon theory but applying to practice. Recognizing education as a site for colonialism allows us to move toward understanding the challenges and opportunities of decolonizing communication pedagogy. We create space for and with educators and scholars to appreciate and value relationality between humans and nature, a plurality of knowledge systems, and building solidarities for just futures. Informed by critical pedagogies (e.g., Freire, hooks, etc.), we define and discuss key terminology, such as colonialism, coloniality, and decolonization. Building upon this collective understanding, we establish the urgent need for a deep and ongoing commitment to decolonial practices in communication spaces inside and outside classrooms. The workshop will include open dialogue about this commitment and how to apply this commitment to self-reflection and critical consciousness.

Salvador Guzman, Rutgers, The State U of New Jersey, USA

This panel session aims to center the role of identity and difference in Interpersonal Communication by foregrounding often-excluded and minoritized voices and experiences in families and relationships. Thus, as we engage this year's theme of Reclaiming Authenticity in Communication, we highlight issues of race, gender, immigration, incarceration, and transnationality to (re)claim familial and relational realities muted in Interpersonal Communication. Last, this panel will discuss methodological and theoretical possibilities for more inclusive and diverse scholarship.

This panel explores challenges and implications of decentering news within journalism studies, specifically when it comes to studying news audiences. Answering recent calls within the field for non-news-centric approaches, it analyzes what prevents journalism scholarship from bringing such a non-news-centric turn to full fruition. Connecting research about Argentinian, Brazilian, Dutch, and Norwegian audiences, the panel offers novel conceptual and methodological approaches to better understand the relative role of news within users' everyday lives.

This panel examines Google's impact on the global development of journalism through its deeply paradoxical effects on the platform economy. At the same time as the Google News Initiative is funding innovation through competitive grants, governments across the world are initiating policies to redistribute platform revenue to journalism organizations. We aim to foster conversations about platform capture and how Google has become akin to a global state shaping the future of journalism infrastructures.

While digital technologies facilitate and even encourage the imperative to both speak up and be seen, mediated silences and refusals can also be considered important feminist strategies in the digital age. This panel explores the political potential of silence and refusal at a time when we are increasingly turning our attention to digital media and their technical capacity to afford people a voice and right to speak.

Digital ethnographers use social media, video chat, and other digital tools to explore the hybrid lives of individuals and communities. This raises new questions around the authenticity of ourselves and our data as the boundaries blur in contemporary fieldwork. In this panel, we reflect on a range of fieldwork projects to explore the dilemmas that arise and strategies we use to carry out ethnographic research that is genuine, ethical, and practical for the digital age.

Research into the effects of social media on well-being often distinguishes “active” and “passive” use. This panel features globally recognized scholars who will discuss why the field might consider alternatives to measures of active vs. passive use, and how we might productively go about doing so. Bringing together different international voices, the panel will debate the merits of theoretical refinements of active and passive use and spotlight promising alternative approaches.

Learning to Listen and Care: Reflections on Constructive Journalism Education in South Africa

Marenet Jordaan, Stellenbosch U, SOUTH AFRICA

Journalism educators in the Global South increasingly realize they should create authentic learning spaces reflecting the realities of specific contexts—rather than adhere to values associated with Westernized notions of journalism training. Through contributions informed by research and reflections on India, the Middle East, South America, and South Africa, this panel aims to stimulate debates about the inherent value of journalism education, including the challenges of media literacy, investigative journalism, and teaching in undemocratic societies.

Data relations are social relations. As such, data relations should be of central concern for critical theorists in communication, media, information, and technology studies. Yet normative traditions of social theory and critical social science remain eschewed in favor of “flat” or descriptive methods. This panel asks after the role of critique for understanding contemporary data relations, with particular attention paid to transnational issues, popularized “tech criticism,” and reconfigurations of power.

This roundtable considers the relationship between migrant subjects and digital technologies as an intersectional investigation into the politics of citizenship and mediation. We analyze two facets: media against migrants, whether in topic (e.g., YouTube series promoting racist ideologies) or in use (e.g., cameras surveilling borders); and media for migrants, as in the ways that peoples on the move mobilize technologies to facilitate transnational movements or to advocate for themselves.

Smart city platforms—encompassing mobile apps, cameras, sensors, algorithms, and predictive analytics—function as surveillance tools. These Internet-connected devices and services generate troves of data on residents, including travel patterns, mobile device identifiers, Internet browsing history, phone contacts, and more. Research suggests that excessive surveillance reinforces a sense of insecurity and leads residents to fear civil liberties violations, particularly among communities of color. This panel will engage participants in considering the technical, legal, ethical, and spatial aspects of smart technologies.

To better understand the fast-changing dynamics of the current media environment and its relationship with political processes in countries around the world, this panel connects communication scholars using computational methods to analyze any form of communication that is time-dynamic. Our panel focuses on the temporal or longitudinal evolution of a wide range of media platforms—from social media platforms such as Facebook and Twitter to online news media and offline television media.

The purpose of this panel is to present inspiring examples of engaged CAM research. Engaged CAM research means collaboration with the community—children and adolescents in particular—at all stages of the research process. This approach not only helps to formulate more relevant research questions, but also ensures that results reach those who will benefit most, helping to maximize impact. By sharing experiences, we hope to excite the CAM community about engaged research.

Public and private actors collect data on people's media behavior, which contributes to perceptions of dataveillance among media users. As a result, users may restrict their digital communication behavior, so-called chilling effects. This panel of international scholars presents pioneering analyses of chilling effects from varied perspectives. It creates a space for discussing the issue and developing a future research agenda on this topic for communication science. The panel crosses disciplinary boundaries and includes policy implications.

Our panel interrogates the transformation of borders into mediated spaces where structures of power become visible through extractive and exploitative practices. We discuss how digitized systems of identity verification are trained to distinguish authentic/nonauthentic asylum claims, and how media reproduce, and occasionally challenge, practices of exclusion that amplify certain migrant voices as more or less “authentic”. In doing so, we reflect on how the concept of authenticity helps us to understand order, but also migrants’ resistance.

This roundtable examines the role of the social media influencer, analyzing how platform affordances, user-generated content, and follower engagement generate a cultural practice that has become central to understanding how race, gender, sexuality, and disability operate in digital culture. Focusing on the common topics of beauty, wellness, and lifestyle, it considers how influencers have come to reflect and shape emerging discourses on identity while navigating an environment structured by platform capitalism and algorithmic bias.

Whether the beginning of a “robot uprising” or simply the next stage in the automated replacement (or augmentation) of human labor, robots have begun to work within public space. Whether delivery from Starship, Amazon, or Postmates, or internal robots in hotels, restaurants and other shared spaces, these and other “last mile” robots deliver, greet, direct, and serve in public.

In this blue sky, we will discuss an extension of social robotics research into a working public system, examining the perceived agency (and patiency) of these robots. The goal of this session will be to establish a framework for analysis and research collaboration examining the relationships between the public and working robots.

From “Zoom University” and the “Twitter Academic” to GoogleDocs and Slack DMs, commercial platforms increasingly determine the conditions of scholarly work and collaboration. Convening as racialized and/or gendered scholars from across Canada, the US, and the UK, we unpack the platformization of cultural production’s influence over the communicative labours and work hazards of the academy. We argue that feminist media studies provides a framework for understanding the cultural, economic, and highly aesthetic roles that platforms play in academic work.

A profound recent change in many countries is a surge in political polarization and hyperpartisanship. This panel explores the interface of societal political polarization and communication in the workplace. It addresses how polarization in organizational communication may be theorized; how our scholarship can contribute to understanding the problems caused by, as well as solutions to, polarization; and an agenda for organizational communication scholarship to contribute to our understanding of political polarization in the workplace.

Older Adults' Perspectives on the Authenticity of Digital Media: In-Depth Interviews with East York, Canada Residents

Anabel Quan-Haase, Western U, CANADA
Molly-Gloria Patel, Okanagan U, CANADA

This panel focuses on authenticity by examining the diverse perspectives of older adults across countries (Chile, Canada, US, Australia) and areas (rural vs. urban). We look at how perceptions of authenticity shape motivations, uses, and outcomes of technology use. To what extent do older adults evaluate digital communication as less authentic? Developing new understandings of how older adults perceive authenticity is critical for their well-being in a digital world, where much social interaction is mediated.

On Authenticity in Ethnographic Relationships and Listening

Jeffrey Lane, Rutgers, The State U of New Jersey, USA

The call for papers on Reclaiming Authenticity in Communication, much like the field's attention, appears to focus on communicators' manipulation of authenticity. By comparison, less scholarly attention concerns listening as a foundational element of authentic communication. To address this gap, a diverse group of communication scholars/practitioners will compare definitions, perspectives, and practices of authentic listening in domains where listening is critical: Black feminism/journalism, rural engagement via an extension model, interpersonal relationships, and ethnography.

This panel presents novel and alternative approaches to understanding authenticity in the journalistic practices, which are gaining ground in the Global South, going beyond the normative claims of professional journalism. It will discuss how different grammars developed across the globe and why we need to challenge past and present attempts to universalize a notion of "authentic" journalism. The panel brings South-to-South conversations around communication practices and their multiples meanings, through case studies from the Middle East, Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

Researchers interested in constructive journalism are concerned with how a balanced, accurate, and authentic kind of reporting resonates with an audience; reports that emphasize not only the problem but also what actions are taken—or can be taken—to engage with events. Researchers interested in mediated distant suffering are interested in representation and reception of distant suffering. In this panel, both kinds of researchers will discuss how they can benefit from each other's knowledge and expertise, and how this knowledge can inform journalistic practice, especially reporting about conflict and disaster.

Post-truth as Contentious Digital Politics in Authoritarian Contexts

Jun Liu, U of Copenhagen, DENMARK

This roundtable features a dialogue between contributors of an edited collection (2023) arguing that “post-truth” is conditionally useful for critical communication theory, as a historically specific or conjunctural regime of truth. The authors discuss its globalizing as well as localizing, and nationally specific, features, comparing and contrasting tendencies and events specifically across Canada, the U.S., India, China, and the Nordic countries. They argue that broader cultural and historical aspects have causal agency and are overlooked by a focus on “information disorders.”

Six years after #MeToo revitalized, and as it is clear that women around the world continue to be under attack, this panel of journalism scholars addresses a research deficit in studies about news coverage of violence against women in the Global South, such as Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, Libya, Yemen, and Syria. Before #MeToo, #NiUnaMenos surfaced in Argentina, inspiring authentic resistance to this violence in America and the Middle East, but still, the problem persists.

Nevertheless, researching these relatively closed information environments raises important ethical and methodological questions, especially when accessing the content of communications. This panel brings together scholars from five continents to explore the unique challenges of studying mobile chat apps.

Gunn Enli, U of Oslo, NORWAY

How do European politicians across different political cultures use performed authenticity to connect with voters and seem trustworthy? By unpacking mediated authenticity as communicative strategies, the panel pinpoints that “being real” is contextual to political cultures. Although social media are global, the panel discusses different approaches to the personalization of politics and argues that what is considered “authentic” in one context might be deemed inauthentic elsewhere.

(Sheraton)*ChairsJimmie Manning, U of Nevada, Reno, USA
Leena Mikkola, Tampere U, FINLAND

Workplace communication scholars focus on the communication practices that enable productive, collegial, collaborative, functional, and/or efficient work environments. Scholars from many different areas of ICA—including organizational communication, interpersonal communication, communication and technology, intergroup communication, mobile communication, among others—study workplace relationships. This workshop allows those scholars to join for intradisciplinary conversations about workplace communication and to receive feedback on current workplace communication-oriented projects. The workshop is open to all ICA members at all career stages.

This panel argues that scholars and industries overemphasize the radical potential of diversity and inclusion in a world of racial capitalism. Through interrogation of the racial politics of social media, ballet troupes, algorithmic culture, and copyright law, the scholars show that overemphasis on diversity and inclusion risks instrumentalizing, monetizing, minimizing, and constraining people of color instead of changing cultures to transformatively embrace and value their whole humanities.

Privacy research in communication and media studies is strongly Western-centric and seldom comparative, prioritizing voices from the Global North/West and limiting its generalizability. Addressing this issue, our panel acts as a forum for cutting edge comparative privacy research. Five input presentations from communication scholars conducting research across four continents feature rich and contextualized perspectives. Ample time is set aside for discussion and mutual learning to advance comparative privacy research.

As “influencing” creeps into all forms of work, using the concept of influencer creep illuminates the expansion of micro-celebrity practices into everyday life. Through analysis of Israeli war influencers on Instagram, mental health therapists and broadcast journalists on TikTok, artisans’ production and promotion on social media, and game streamers performances on Twitch.tv., this panel highlights the importance of interrogating influencer creep in our networked society while revisiting moral questions about the commodification of authenticity.

This panel addresses the intersection of transnational fan practices, national politics, and international politics in East Asia. Transnational social media and streaming services are now the default media experience, and celebrities command transnational fandom. However, this media flow creates tension with nationally positioned fans. Papers on this panel examine fans becoming increasingly involved in nationalist or even reactionary politics in China, Japan, and South Korea.

In our commitment to the 2023 ICA conference theme “Reclaiming Authenticity in Communication,” the South Asia Communication Association (SACA) will host this interactive research session. As an organizational member of ICA, SACA represents a joint effort of media and communication scholars and practitioners in South Asia and the South Asian diaspora worldwide. We constituted SACA in 2015 at San Francisco as an umbrella organization with a presence in several organizations and their conferences. SACA members comprise teachers, scholars, researchers, and professionals who examine the media and communication practices of the nine-country region of South Asia (Afghanistan, Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Maldives, Myanmar, Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka) and the South Asian diaspora worldwide. SACA members may constitute people with research interest in any of these nine nations or the South Asian diaspora worldwide. We invite you to share your perspectives and challenges in conducting communication research on South Asia and South Asian diaspora.

BLUE SKY BIG IDEAS WORKSHOP: Burn after Reading: Research-Related Trauma, Symbolic Violence, and the Need for Structural Solutions

Research-related trauma has traditionally been conceptualized as vicarious trauma caused by working in conflict zones or with populations who have experienced death and violence. More recently, scholars working across disciplines have begun mostly informal conversations about extending the concept to also include folks conducting long-term research examining symbolic violence, such as racist, sexist, anti-LGBTQ discourses. In the tradition of last year's "Fuck Individual Resilience" article and ICA fundraiser, this Blue Sky Workshop explores another endemic crisis in academia—a lack of infrastructural support for scholars experiencing research-related trauma. Anyone interested in participating in this critical discussion geared toward challenging the lack of structural resources and helping to create best-practices for addressing it moving forward is welcomed and encouraged to attend.

The French society for information and communication research (sfsic.org) supports the emergence of innovative research groups. These groups organize independently, yet regularly report to the Sfsic and participate in national conferences. They transcend classic research fields and propose new and creative research agendas. In this panel, new approaches to research & creation, digital ethics, health communication, fan studies, and organizational communication will be presented. International scholars partnering with the French SRGs will be presenting.

Remaining Ties of Solidarity? Russian Feminist Social Media Influencers' Stance on the Gendered Experience of War

Saara Ratilainen, Tampere U, FINLAND

This panel contributes to a nuanced understanding of trans/national feminist solidarity enabled by digital platforms, with a focus on Russia's full-scale invasion of Ukraine. It brings together scholars working on feminism and media in different socio-political settings, critically adopting Western scholarship. Using various methodological approaches, the panel explores communication within the feminist networks in Ukraine and Russia and problematizes the emerging forms of solidarity and resistance within the grassroots networks, activists coalitions and by celebrity feminists.

With CAT researchers increasingly using digital data in research, we must also discuss ethical considerations for collecting, analyzing, and reporting that data. This Blue Sky Workshop brings together data ethics researchers, former members of ICA's Professional Standards Committee, and conference attendees to discuss ethical concerns raised by communication research using pervasive data (i.e., rich digital data about people, generated through digital interactions), and identify resources to help ICA members engage in ethical research practices.

Online harassment of journalists is on the rise, yet the term “online harassment” is nebulous, obscures the motivations of attackers, and suggests that such harassment ends at the borders of the Internet. This diverse international panel will examine the phenomenon of online harassment, its connection to “mob censorship” (Waisbord, 2020), how various actors use technological infrastructure to target journalists with impunity and harm their journalistic role in democratic and authoritarian contexts, and what that means for journalism.

The panel brings together political economy and cultural studies-oriented approaches to examine how nationalism is reproduced as a source of "authentic" identity in a world of constant cultural flux. Drawing on scientific literature as well as empirical studies from different parts of the world, it sheds light on the role of both traditional and digital media—in concert with markets and politics—in reproducing nationalism and legitimizing its claims to authenticity.

Through different theoretical and methodological approaches, the authors emphasize the meaning of invisible and marginalized communities such as the LGBTQI+ community in Seoul during the COVID-19 pandemic or incarcerated people in the U.S., memory in German public spheres or resistance through cameras in Syria. The red thread that connects the papers is the struggle for inclusion.

Disinformation research has evolved considerably. Reinvigorated by highly politicized cases during recent years, the previously rather dormant field moved to the top of research agendas worldwide. After a first phase of solidifying empirical proof of disinformation, more recent studies expand their scope and detail level considerably. This panel unites studies from this new phase of research, giving answers on how disinformation “works” in varying contexts and what future disinformation trends may entail.

Social media influencer marketing is increasingly common in political campaigns, but their impacts are hard to conceptualize or measure and policy responses are largely inadequate. This panel is organized around four provocations related to how researchers can develop theory and methods for understanding the political roles of social media influencers and content creators in campaigns. Each panelist draws on their experience researching specific issues in Chile, UK, US, and Canada.

In this panel, a diverse group of scholars presents and discusses new theoretical frameworks for understanding the idiosyncratic nature of social organization and collective action in digital contexts. While traditional sociological and ethnographic approaches to online sociality have yielded valuable insights into a range of online cultures and practices, these emerging theoretical perspectives offer a new conceptual language to examine and critique uniquely digital forms of interaction and organization.

The current panel of psychologists, historians, linguists, media experts, and literary scholars uses qualitative and quantitative methods to examine fake authenticities created by antisemitic hate speech online. It seeks to understand how we can communicate intentionally to combat antisemitism in media, and in interculturally competent ways. The panel showcases four empirical studies concentrating on the forms, interactive negotiations, and effects of antisemitism online as well as the coping strategies of emerging adults confronted with antisemitism.

This roundtable panel explores what a future of hybrid film festivals means for the festival sector and the broader screen industries. Bringing together perspectives from Australia, Canada, US, and UK, this panel interrogates how hybrid festivals challenge established disciplinary framings of film festivals as cultural and industrial events. It asks: How has going hybrid impacted festival labour, audiences, the negotiation of cultural power, and the ongoing relevance of film festivals within broader screen industry ecologies?

What is the state-of-the-field of disability communications research? A proliferation of scholarship has occurred in the communicative aspects of disability, examining media and cultural representations, communicative practices, technology and the digital divide, mobilities, among other topics. Such works begin to challenge the normative underpinnings of all aspects of communications in society. In this blue sky session, we invite scholars to chart and take stock of the current scholarship around disability communication. What are the key areas and insights that have emerged over the past decade? What is the future of disability communications research and how has the pandemic affected disability communications research? What forms can it take and what aspects of communications should research focus on?

This roundtable brings together knowledge makers, from a range of experiences and fields related to communication, to share their experiences of silencing vs. uplifting, collaboration vs. extraction, gatekeeping vs. fostering. From these experiences, we will generate a taxonomy of such dynamics and the possible choices that arise from them, and discuss further strategies for challenging the white supremacy and colonial dynamics within and across academia, including decentering of academia as a source of knowledge.

This panel explores how critical scholars teach authentically in undergraduate organizational communication classrooms. While some research in the field is finally reckoning with embedded white supremacy and capitalist hegemony, organizational communication classes for undergraduates still center managerial thinking and invisibilize marginalized knowledges. Our undergraduate teaching is, in itself, an organizing practice that merits the attention of our discipline. Through innovative pedagogies, the panelists resist normativity and discuss their methods of teaching in-line with radical commitments.

This panel attempts to help us unpack the social and political conjuncture within which the contemporary social movements in Iran, sparked by the murder of Jina (Mahsa) Amini, have appeared and spread. The paper presentations account for the multidimensionality of this ongoing feminist movement for justice, activists’ use of digital platforms for creative bodily and spatial tactics to generate solidarity, and the themes embedded in Western mainstream media coverage of the protests. By attending to the simultaneous discourses of power within which Iranian women’s activisms are occurring, the panel contributes to the extension of contemporary frameworks of social movements in the MENA region.

This panel posits that neoliberal media and telecommunications policies, dominant since the 1990s across much of the world, have failed on grounds of both equality and democracy. Our papers offer historical reflection and contemporary analysis of what accounts for this failure, whether national or global. Moreover, the panel begins and ends with attempts to consider how we might revisit an earlier moment of anti-colonial policy-making to re-imagine decolonial policy futures beyond neoliberalism.

Odilia Yim, U of Toronto, CANADA

As a result of social justice movements, such as Black Lives Matter and Stop Asian Hate, we now have a spotlight on minority group members and their ability to present their authentic selves. The study and discussion of minority communities is uniquely complex: present trends in promoting diversity, equity, and inclusion (DEI) in organizations and institutions have been the result of greater social awareness, yet monolithic conceptualizations are problematic and the need for more nuanced subgroup identities may be needed. As an answer to ICA's invitation "to examine authenticity as a core construct of communication from a variety of perspectives using diverse methodologies across different levels of analysis", members of the International Association of Language and Social Psychology (IALSP) present this roundtable discussion panel to highlight: (a) the international and interdisciplinary work we do in the area of language and social psychology; and especially, (b) the important work we are doing related to promoting diverse voices in their presentation of their social identities. Here, we will bring together research on language, communication, and social psychology addressing social identities and intergroup communication among individuals who are members of minoritized, racialized, marginalized, and/or vulnerable populations.

Ana Rosa, UNISINOS, BRAZIL

This panel addresses the overarching question of how conditions of poverty affect people's possibilities to enact informed and active citizenship through their use of the media. Bringing together scholarship on digital media technologies, media use, and poverty from different empirical contexts, including Scandinavian welfare states, the Global South, and North America, this panel advances our theoretical understanding of how social, digital, and material inequalities condition the possibilities for enacting citizenship.

The panel considers the challenges to Web 3.0 governance that technologies such as immersive media and artificial intelligence pose to the traditional liberal model of individual autonomy. The panel mounts a three-pronged critique of this model centered on how Web 3.0 participants internalize gender- and race-based oppression at the expense of internal autonomy competencies; the meaning of algorithmic harm in interactions with autonomous virtual agents; and responsibility in conditions of distributed agency.

Kuansong Victor Zhuang, Nanyang Technological U, SINGAPORE

How can disability provoke new ways of thinking about communication research? As a generative form of identity and knowledge, disability research has matured over the last thirty years, resulting in new ways of thinking about the experience of disability in global contexts. In communication studies, disability has seen growing interest in a range of areas, such as health communications, assistive technology, mobile communications, media representations, and communicative practices. Central to this move has been the growth of disability studies, which forefronts the lived experience of disabled people to challenge the taken-for-granted and normative ways in which we come to know about disability. Disabling communication studies thus serves as a provocation to think more critically about the foundational epistemological bases of communication scholarship.

This panel looks at practices of digital disconnection as soft activism. Presentations will argue that individual lifestyle choices provide a vantage point for critical interventions in contemporary culture and society. The presentations ask which ideologies and values are acted upon, by which actors and leaders, and how. Overall, the panel discusses whether soft activism is capable of making social critique visible, or whether it tends to deprive protest of its critical potential.

Little doubt exists that we are experiencing a crisis regarding democratic government throughout the western world, characterized by polarization and the potential for civil war, the normalization of hate speech, the decline of rationality, and the rise of authoritarian governments concomitant with a sense of decline and decay of democracy. General semantics and related perspectives can contribute to our understanding of our current predicament, and importantly, can suggest potential solutions to the contemporary crisis.

It focuses on the overarching question of how these novel methods can inform complex racism research. To this end, the panel provides a forum to discuss the projects' common methodological and theoretical challenges, putting a special focus on issues of combining different methods, validating results, and identifying limitations in big data analysis.

This panel offers a multi-national, critical discussion of public media models in Europe, India, South Africa, and the US. As news organizations across the world experiment with new revenue models and introduce trust-building practices, the fundamental problem remains unsolved: how can the ideational value of journalism, essential to a functioning democracy, be "sold" to news audiences and citizens? The solution likely lies in reinventing journalism and reimagining it as a public good (Pickard, 2019).

On a planet beset by ever-mounting challenges on all-too many severe fronts, environmental communicators need more powerful and plentiful tools than ever before to engage, inspire, and activate audiences who seem increasingly fragmented, polarized, and distracted from ecological imperatives. This panel draws on the practice and teaching of four diverse instructors of environmental communication to present rationales, strategies, and techniques to foster teaching and learning via arts-based research (ABR). Through proven classroom exercises in storytelling, filmmaking, music and “artistic nature walks”, students are called on not only to learn foundations of our discipline, but also to bring their fullest, authentic selves to addressing actual environmental challenges through communication using the timeless resonance of the arts to reach people's hearts and minds.

This panel looks at authenticity in communication via the lenses of media freedom and democracy in contemporary Europe. Through references to findings from the EU-funded project MEDIADELCOM (www.mediadelcom.eu), it looks at the broader cultural contexts alongside diversity (and a mismatch) of democratic media visions—their interpretations and potential cultural barriers to media freedom implementation. The contributions use various methodologies, including comparative analysis, agent-oriented modeling, and case studies of critical cultural junctures.

Debates about diversifying, de-Westernising, and decolonizing the field have been ongoing at the ICA. While most agree that the field needs to be more internationally diverse, progress has been slow. This workshop will be led by convenors of a new network for globalising media studies (<https://globalmediastudies.network/>). The network currently comprises 700-plus scholars, three-quarters of whom study non-Western contexts. The workshop will report on inputs gathered thus far and invite additional ideas from participants.

Leading scholars discuss how to make journalism studies more applicable in a time of polarizing conflict. These scholars start and end—and start again—with the newsrooms, who play center stage in defining and navigating nations' political and cultural crises. Sometimes described as “interventions,” this community-based scholarship directly links the academy with the “real world” in an emerging methodology that goes beyond ethnographic participant observation. We give our tips and tricks to doing this work.

Where education and technology intersect—"edtech" in a broad sense—we find entrenched battles over authenticity: in the sense of authentication and facticity; in the sense of traditionally authentic classroom experiences of dialogue, as opposed to reproduction and dissemination; and in the sense of authentic, human connections, as opposed to parasocial and algorithmic simulations of attention and care. The problematic of authenticity in/and edtech will be the focus of this panel. Tanner Mirrlees will be the respondent.

This full-day postconference will convene scholars and practitioners to discuss and reimagine the role of urban communication and urban technology research and praxis. Participants are invited to engage with urgent and emerging questions about power and inequality amid multiple convergent crises, including but not limited to housing, poverty, discrimination, and climate change. The event aims to create an open and collaborative environment for discussing themes and challenges related to urban communication but also opportunities to advance ethical and equitable futures for and through urban communication, technology design, and policy through scholarship and activism. Work foregrounding questions of power and inequality from local, global, and/or transnational lenses, and underrepresented regions and communities is strongly encouraged.

The importance of science communication has been increasing, due to different social processes. This led to more content being labeled as science-based in a diverse set of contexts. How are different stakeholders and groups represented in the discourse and how does this affect the outcome of science communication activities? This postconference will look at the diverse research being conducted in science communication and how it includes the role of the people participating in it.

Digital platforms and personalisation are important for how we engage with public issues online. Whether we scroll through social media, visit a streaming platform, or use a news aggregator, the content we see is at least partly determined by algorithmic curation. So far, curation algorithms are often metrics and engagement driven, thereby contributing to digital dilemmas such as click- or ragebaiting or the spread of disinformation. Moreover, the inner workings of curation algorithms and their underlying objectives often remain opaque. Building on the knowledge that we have about how platform affordances shape public discourse and democratic decision-making, this postconference aims to explore future opportunities for responsible, value-sensitive platform design.

The question of what role knowledge and science play with regard to a more socially just and sustainable society is highly topical both in media ethics and in neighboring disciplines. Presently there are discussions on why the current structures of knowledge generation and communication are violent in themselves and how transformation processes can be successful. While both practical and intercultural philosophy offer approaches to questioning and deconstructing universalisms, media ethics provides an understanding of how master narratives shape societal perceptions of knowledge and science. How do even these approaches exert epistemic violence and thereby obstruct the vision of greater participation and socio-ecological justice? How does an inclusive understanding of knowledge relate to the value of authenticity? Can the ethics of authenticity help to overcome epistemic injustice?

Pre/Postconferences

Chair

Jeremy Schulz, U of California, Berkeley, USA

The postconference provides a global tent for the emergent field of media sociology that is growing in the ICA community. Welcoming submissions from any geographic location, theoretical perspective, and/or methods, the event brings together global scholars to build this scholarly community at ICA. Contributing to ICA's theme "Reclaiming Authenticity," we particularly encourage work on authenticity in media, public discourse, and popular culture vis-à-vis relational, social, political, and cultural implications in different international contexts.
