Savor the Magic We Have for You Too

When you discover that Walt Disney World Resort offers more than just food for kids, it’s definitely a delicious surprise. Experience award-winning restaurants, exotic cuisines, and romantic candlelit settings that are all made for adults to enjoy. And with one-of-a-kind family experiences, meet and greet with some of your favorite Characters, and a host of thrilling rides, you’ll see that a Disney vacation has a flavor for everyone’s taste.

Visit MyDisneyDiscovery.com and explore the world of family and grown-up excitement waiting for you.
From the President .................................................. 4

Gearing up for the Democrats
Carolina journalists prepare for the Democratic Convention that’s headed for Charlotte this year.

Get your journalist foot in the door
Journalism professors give tips on how to get the best hands-on internship to further your career.

Wallace Terry, chronicled history
Meet the man who documented first-hand the effects of the Vietnam War had on African-Americans and how his legacy has continued.

School Daze ......................................................... 7
NABJ heads back to The Big Easy .............................. 10
Obama no longer media darling .............................. 15
Digital diva takes a big byte .................................. 13
Meet the Hall of Fame Honorees ............................ 21
NABJ chapters update .......................................... 26
From the President

Dear NABJ Family,

I am pleased to welcome back the NABJ Journal.

As part of changing the way NABJ delivers its services to its members, we determined we wanted to better reflect the constant changes in our industry.

One way to do that is to work on how we communicate with our membership.

In addition to the NABJ print journal, please visit the new NABJ e-Journal on www.nabj.org

For years, NABJ's publications have evolved from a monthly printed update on the news and notes from our association to the glossy quarterly Journal, a publication geared toward more issues-oriented journalism and a marketing showcase for NABJ.

NABJ's leadership is hard at work making NABJ indispensable to you the members: creating projects and programs that will bolster the strength of NABJ, push for jobs, create training opportunities and advocate for better representation of African-Americans in media coverage.

In this issue you will read about our 2012 Hall of Fame honorees. Since 1990, NABJ has honored pioneering journalists who represent the best and brightest in journalism and whose contributions to the craft have been legendary in nature. Our honorees are role models who have committed themselves to ensuring freedom of the press, and phenomenal reporting and storytelling.

The election season is well underway. In this issue, read about the upcoming elections and see what our members are covering on the campaign trail.

Also in this issue get a sneak peak of convention. Planning efforts for the 2012 Convention & Career Fair in New Orleans, June 20-24 are well underway. This year's convention theme is “NABJ12: New Platforms. New Directions. New Orleans.” Our convention committee has been hard at work to make sure New Orleans will be a convention to remember.

Please check out our print and online journal to read the latest from NABJ and the work we are doing as the largest advocate on behalf of black journalist's world-wide.

NABJ continues to champion diversity, and we take seriously our role of serving as the watchdog over media outlets that we do not feel place diversity at the forefront. Know that NABJ is committed to speaking up, speaking out, and wants to offer real solutions to the problems we see.

Onward,

Gregory Lee Jr.
President
National Association Black Journalists
To my NABJ family,

As we enter into what I am sure will be another great year for the National Association of Black Journalists (NABJ), I could not be more excited to welcome back one of our key publications – the NABJ Journal.

The NABJ Journal is one of the premier benefits of becoming an NABJ member. As an organization dedicated to expanding opportunities for black journalists, the NABJ Journal is also one of the most essential means of expression we can provide. Whether it be an article detailing the lack of diversity in newsrooms, or a piece outlining tips on how to stay afloat in this struggling economy, the NABJ Journal will always contain vital information to better serve our communities.

Last year, NABJ had tremendous success in providing quality programs and services for black journalists worldwide. We disbursed over $110,000 in scholarships to students, hosted an outstanding Convention and Career Fair in Philadelphia that drew thousands in attendance, and consistently held major media corporations accountable for their policies concerning diversity in the newsroom. In 2012, NABJ will continue to advocate on behalf of black journalists with even greater enthusiasm and results.

On behalf of the Board of Directors and the entire staff of NABJ, I appreciate your support of our organization and I wish you nothing but success in the coming year. Please remember to mark your calendars for this year's Convention and Career Fair in New Orleans, Louisiana June 20th – 24th at the Hilton Riverside Hotel!

Yours in service,

Maurice Foster, Esq., CMP
Executive Director
National Association of Black Journalists
Mary Curtis remembers the excitement in Denver in 2008 when Barack Obama became the first African-American to win the Democratic presidential nomination. “It was part of history, being in that stadium,” said Curtis, an award-winning columnist who formerly wrote for the Charlotte Observer and other newspapers. “I let my sister, who marched for civil rights, hear it [Obama’s nomination being announced] over the phone...no matter what your politics, it was history being made.”

Curtis will be part of that history again. Except this time, she’ll be one of a number of black journalists covering the Democratic National Convention on her home turf of Charlotte, N.C., during the week of Sept. 3. “The people are very excited,” Curtis said. “Back then [in 2008] they were choosing a candidate, but now they’re going to have a sitting president in Charlotte, and they’re expecting more than 30,000 people. Charlotte will be on an international stage.”

The Democratic National Committee chose Charlotte over Cleveland, St. Louis and Minneapolis to host the convention. Already Curtis, who writes a column about the convention for that city’s alternative weekly, Creative Loafing, and is a contributing writer for the Huffington Post, is looking forward to Charlotte’s impending spotlight. “I was at the 2008 convention, but this will be different,” Curtis said. “I know the players a little bit better...it will be more familiar to me. I’m hoping that being here will give me a jump on stories.”

She says that the excitement is mounting not just because North Carolina will be a swing state in Obama’s re-election campaign, but because it will give journalists like her a chance to spotlight much of Charlotte’s black heritage, as well as further hone their skills. “People have a lot of misconceptions about Charlotte, that it’s mostly NASCAR and barbecue,” Curtis said. “But we have an African-American mayor and police chief...this will also be the 100th anniversary of Romare Bearden’s [famed black collage artist] birth, and most of his works are in Mecklenburg County.”

Also gearing up for the convention is Cheryl Carpenter, managing editor at the Charlotte Observer. So far three black journalists at that newspaper - Celeste Smith, April Bethea and Fred Clasen-Kelly - are expected to be involved in covering the convention, she said. Smith will be part of the advance team, while Bethea will be the newspaper’s online representative, Carpenter said. “She [Bethea] will be crucial in creating a mobile presence for us.” Carpenter said. “I think we’re all pretty excited, and the paper knows this will be a challenge for us getting everything out that week,” Bethea said. “But we now have it where (readers) are better at posting stuff.”

Clasen-Kelly will cover security issues - although he views that assignment from a broader perspective. “I’m thinking of it as covering democracy,” he said. “I’m going to cover it objectively, but I also want to cover it in a way so that people will be able to express themselves.”

Said Carpenter: “It’s an exciting time to be a journalist in Charlotte. We’re going to have new challenges, but I can’t think of a more exciting time to be here.”

Tonyaa J. Weathersbee is a columnist for The Florida Times-Union in Jacksonville, Fla. and a columnist for BlackAmericaWeb.
School Daze

J-schools Prepare Students for Evolving Industry

By DANIELLE WILSON

Today’s journalists must be able to adapt to the use of many digital tools in addition to having solid journalism skills.

By now, that refrain should be the masthead for any journalist who has edited, filmed, photographed, reported or written a news story in the past decade. Even media professionals who did not survive the past several years of newsroom cutbacks, layoffs and mergers, became savvy in parlaying their multimedia skills into operations that pay all or at least part of their bills.

But what about the next generation of journalists who wonder whether four years of college or more will result in gainful employment post-graduation? And how are journalism educators, many of whom are NABJ members, helping student journalists navigate their futures?

Ernest Wilson, dean of the Annenberg School for Communication at the University of Southern California, addressed the topic nearly three years ago in an essay for the Poynter Institute for Media Studies. A recurring theme in Wilson’s article was this:

“What we teach and how we teach needs to be deeply informed by more regular conversations with practitioners. Journalism professors need to reach out more systematically to media professionals in the new and the legacy media. We need to go to professionals in their newsrooms and business offices, and to the garages and new media incubators of media entrepreneurs.”

Journalism faculty and administrators in Arizona, Florida, Kentucky and Tennessee recently discussed their approaches in preparing students for news-related careers in a still unsteady environment. Their actions, in many ways, mirror Wilson’s words.

Dorothy Bland, director of the Division of Journalism at Florida A & M University, believes that journalism schools are doing a good job in providing students skills they will need to be competitive in the constantly evolving media landscape.

She says that FAMU, along with other journalism programs, recognize the need to adapt and transition into a more “diverse” experience for journalism training.

“One of the things I am most particularly proud of is the stronger emphasis on multimedia journalism,” says Bland. “The foundation of writing is very important for all of media, but we have gotten an appreciation for digital communication.”

FAMU, which currently enrolls 800 students in its School of Journalism and Graphic Communication, encourages students to “tell stories in so many different ways with so many different tools,” says Bland.

Pamela McAllister Johnson, Ph.D., teaches several courses at Western Kentucky University’s School of Journalism and Broadcasting. Her legacy in print media qualifies as a case study: Johnson is the first African American to head a general circulation newspaper in the United States. For 13 years, she was president and publisher of the Ithaca Journal, a Gannett newspaper in upstate New York. Johnson also worked for several other print and broadcasting companies, and has taught at universities throughout the United States.

Johnson served as director of WKU’s journalism school and its Center for 21st Century Journalism for digital communication. Johnson says that journalism schools similar to Western Kentucky University are changing to fit the academic and professional needs of students.

“I think that we are evolving and adapting at the same time, so that when we first started, we made changes to go with the industry,” says Johnson. “Now we’re projecting out preparing graduating classes years in advance.”

One way that Western Kentucky assists historically black colleges and universities is by providing multimedia training to journalism educators each summer through a partnership with The Dow Jones News Fund.

INNOVATION AND TECHNOLOGY ARE ESSENTIAL

Retha Hill, executive director of Digital Innovation and Entrepreneurship Lab and a professor of practice at Arizona State University, says many journalism schools lack the technology and innovation to compete in the current market.

“For every school that’s trying to innovate, there are schools shipping out their journalism departments,” says Hill. She says schools need to identify the current trends and change their programs to meet those needs.

ASU’s Walter Cronkite School of Journalism and Mass Communication appears to have embraced such trends. The school’s website is packed with centers, institutes, endowments, fellowships and other programs designed to equip its students with relevant, cutting-edge programs.

“The foundation of writing is very important for all of media, but we have gotten an appreciation for digital communication.”

— Dorothy Bland, director of the Division of Journalism at Florida A & M University
“Only a handful of schools are in the position to make that step forward,” said Hill, a former vice president for content for BET Interactive. Before joining BET, Hill was executive producer for special projects at washingtonpost.com.

Hill echoes Wilson when noting the importance of a community and surrounding environment in the function and success of a journalism program. “If you can’t tap into the innovative culture down the street from you, it says a lot about the dean’s vision at that school or lack thereof,” she says.

Bland of FAMU agrees that that effective journalism programs also stress learning outside the classroom. “We feel strongly about internships because they give you the opportunity to experience the career you plan to enter.” “We are training our students to not only survive but thrive,” says Bland.

Current media employers who seek “young, bright talent,” expect students to have strong writing and editing skills as well as being adept at shooting video, photographs and social media.

Bland also believes “real-world” experience belongs in the classroom with innovative courses that challenge students. Classes should cover traditional journalism and leadership, management and presentation skills. Students should be challenged to explore all aspects of journalism and even encouraged to “build their own brands and market them.”

Sybril Bennett, Ph.D., an associate professor of journalism at Belmont University, also believes many journalism schools are successfully preparing students for the “real-world” of journalism.

“All journalism schools are sound, but teaching in the future is very challenging,” said Bennett. Schools are adapting by teaching the use of social media in newsgathering and dissemination, along with moving to online products such as university-based news sites, blogs and other multimedia.

Yet, again, the basics still rule.

“Students really need to be good at something, be able to be a good storyteller, have sound information and make sure a story is well told,” says Bennett. “Fairness, ethics, accuracy, attribution, excellent writing and storytelling are still hallmark points for journalists.”

Journalism schools can do a better job of preparing students “identify what news is,” Bennett maintains. “Students should be able to use social media tools, but fundamentally they need to be able to write and tell a good story, while understanding relevance and timeliness.”

Johnson of Western Kentucky often uses the term “visceral” when prodding her students to produce great stories. “A good writer can find the significance of a news story, really dig for the information,” she says.

Hill says ASU wants “students to understand what a multimedia journalist is and understand the meaning of innovation.” She describes how journalism, once a “working-class field” has become a competitive environment filled with skilled journalists with both theoretical knowledge and professional experience.

J-schools should provide students with all the skills they will need to “hit the ground running,” because legacy media wants to hire young people with digital skills and traditional journalism training, says Hill.

As minorities in newsrooms continue to decline, Hill notes that African-American students, in particular, should gain the skills to create their own “start-up” companies.

Johnson stresses the importance of seeking knowledge in a “secondary” area, and says students should be encouraged to bring other interests to the table.

“Whatever you like, including journalism, major in that,” she says.

WHAT TO LOOK FOR IN A J-SCHOOL

Students should seek information about not only the journalism program, but about the faculty and their professional background.

“I am a better teacher and professor because I have real-world experience, and I can draw from that,” says Bland, who came to FAMU in 2007 with more than 25 years of media experience. Bland previously held reporting, editing and managerial positions at USA Today, the Rockford Register Star in Illinois, the Chillicothe Gazette in Ohio, and the Fort Collins Coloradoan in Colorado.

“If you’re going to spend $20,000 or more for an education, you should ask (faculty) ‘Could I get a job and will I have the skill sets I need,’” says Bland.

Bennett also stresses the importance of having highly-trained and informative faculty. Before joining Belmont, Bennett was a two-time Emmy award-winning television news journalist who worked for the ABC affiliate in Milwaukee, and at CBS in Chicago and Nashville, Tenn.

“Schools need innovative faculty members that understand the future of the trends coming down the line,” Bennett says, and added that faculty should understand the “new media client” and multimedia outlets while incorporating the basics of journalism.

Journalism educators interviewed agree that faculty engagement is crucial to the student and reputation of a journalism program. “What are their relationships with other news organizations around the country, and how long has it been since they worked in their field?” are questions students should raise, says Bland.

In terms of the student “outcomes,” a term academia tends to use to explain what and whether a student has learned, listen to Georgia Dawkins, a 2010 FAMU graduate who works as a television producer in Fort Myers, Fla. At FAMU, says Dawkins, it wasn’t uncommon for a professor “to be fresh out of a newsroom or off a plane, bringing back new information to students.

“I got my first internship as a freshman through an FAMU alum,” Dawkins continues. “I received award-winning training at FAMU. I also received love. It was the love of my professors that pushed me across the stage. I am forever grateful.”

Dawkins, who also teaches part-time, says that FAMU “prepared me in every way possible. Sometimes I look at my counterparts and laugh. They often underestimate my skills, but FAMU taught me well. Upon graduation, I was prepared to edit, write, shoot, produce, report and battle office politics. If ever I feel like I missed something, I just call home.”

Danielle Wilson, a 2008 graduate of Virginia Commonwealth University, is a news assistant/editor at NBC12 in Richmond, Va. Wilson is a former student of Bonnie Newman Davis, the NABJ Journal Editor, NABJ’s 2011 Educator of the Year and an endowed professor of journalism at North Carolina A&T State University.
By CORinne Z. lyOnS

Internships are one of the keys to success for students in the journalism industry. They allow students to get hands-on experience while learning their strengths and weaknesses.

Summer breaks are great for students to work as interns. Although summer is many months away, internship application deadlines are quickly approaching and passing. As students complete their applications, many wonder what is the best way to land a stellar internship.

As a former recruiter for the Detroit Free Press, Joe Grimm, has four characteristics he suggests students display to recruiters: hustle, news judgment, teamwork and multimedia skills. Grimm, who currently teaches journalism courses at Michigan State University, said hustle is one skill that can’t be taught.

“You have to find it yourself,” he said. Grimm said other skills like news judgment take practice.

Although specific requirements vary at news organizations, some are almost universal. Irvin B. Harrell, director of community outreach and newsroom recruitment at the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, said he requires a cover letter, a resume and six to eight clips from potential interns. Harrell also said he requests school transcripts because it shows academic performance.

Wayne State University graduate Kyla Smith said that presentation is something recruiters observe when they consider hiring interns. Smith, who has interned at Def Jam Records and for U.S. Senator Roland Burris (D-Illinois), said she’s been told clips should be clean. She said clips that come from a newspaper or magazine should be cut out evenly and mounted neatly on another sheet of paper. Smith said clips shouldn’t be stained or damaged.

For Harrell, it isn’t just the physical appearance of the information he requires but the content as well. Harrell said he has seen many applications with errors.

“It’s gotten progressively worse,” said Harrell, also an assistant business editor at the Post-Dispatch. “I’m not going to be interested in hiring a person who’s sloppy.”

Grimm said when reviewing materials, many recruiters will disregard incomplete applications or applications with errors.

“I might think your stories will be incomplete too,” he said.

Honesty is another component when recruiters evaluate interns that is important in the application process. Hampton University graduate Craig D. Stanley II advises students not to lie because some recruiters filter applications through the Internet or other programs.

“They will find out,” Stanley said. “The industry is really small.”

Both Smith and Stanley worked at their college newspapers before getting their first internship. Smith said the whole basis of journalism is writing. While many of her clips are from print media, Smith has work samples from several broadcast internships, too. Stanley, who currently works for NBC Universal, said students need to show multifaceted work.

Stanley suggests turning print clips into digital clips to show the entire scope of work.

For Harrell, the transition from broadcast to print journalism is about general reporting skills.

“‘You need to make sure that fundamentally you are a good reporter and that will translate,” Harrell said.

Corinne Z. Lyons is a recent graduate of Wayne State University. She majored in journalism and communication studies with the goal of covering news in a city similar to her hometown of Detroit. She has participated in the NABJ Student Projects Program and is looking forward to making a positive contribution at NABJ Students. In her spare time she tutors and mentors students in the Detroit Public Schools district.
NABJ ‘12 brings new approaches for New Orleans

By ASHLEIGH ATWELL

After a 30-year absence, NABJ will return to New Orleans next summer for its annual convention with the theme “#NABJ12: New Platforms. New Directions. New Orleans.” The planning team says NABJ will draw on New Orleans culture to help set it apart from previous conventions.

“It’s New Orleans! We’re really excited to be going down there,” said Aprill O. Turner, NABJ communications consultant and a member of the convention planning committee. “We haven’t been to New Orleans in 29 years, so it’s nice for our convention to return there, and it’s just a great city. It’s colorful, it has flavor and it has good food.”

Convention Chair Rod Hicks said much of the first day is being organized by Honorary Convention Chair Paula Madison. The former NBCUniversal executive - who now owns the WNBA’s L.A. Sparks and The Africa Channel - is calling on influential friends in business and entertainment to ensure a dynamic opening day on Wednesday that she said will include “news-making and entertainment-industry events.”

“The energy and excitement on the first day will set the tone for the convention and will carry through the last day,” said Hicks, who also chaired the successful 2011 convention in Philadelphia.

“The New Orleans convention will have its own distinct feel and personality; it will not be Philadelphia Part 2,” said Hicks, who lives in Philadelphia.

Program Chair Benét Wilson said most workshops will fall under three programming tracks: “Perfecting Your Craft,” “Tool and Tech” and “Innovation Station.”

“All of those are designed to give people what we think is a good mix of the things they want to focus on to keep them relevant,” Wilson said.

Wilson, who also serves as the chair of NABJ’s Digital Journalism Task Force, said there will be something for everyone attending the convention.

“You’re going to see more programs targeted to our students. You’re going to see all the latest tools and technology and more workshops for people that want to do their own thing entrepreneurially,” Wilson said.

NABJ President Gregory Lee said time has been set aside in the convention schedule for attendees to participate in a service project to benefit New Orleans. Residents still are dealing with lingering problems caused by Hurricane Katrina.

“We thought, ‘Why not go in and spend a few hours in the community we’re actually in and give back to the city?’” said Lee, a native of New Orleans.

The convention will take place at the Hilton New Orleans Riverside, along the Mississippi River and in the heart of New Orleans. The city originally was slated to host the convention in 2014, but was bumped up two years after the NABJ board voted to withdraw from next year’s UNITY convention in Las Vegas. The convention will be almost two months earlier than usual, coming in June 20-24.

Nicondra Norwood, president of the New Orleans Association of Black Journalists, said the convention is one of several national and international events held in New Orleans in 2012.

“With so much going on … the members of the local chapter are looking forward to NABJ’s rapidly approaching visit as one of the brightest jewels in that jam-packed schedule,” Norwood said. “We expect our unique position as a small, tight knit community with international, big-city appeal to provide the perfect setting for the exchange of ideas and personal professional development.”

Turner is convinced it will be an unforgettable experience.

“The convention planning committee has been hard at work to plan a don’t-miss convention,” Turner said. “If you miss this convention, you’ll be kicking yourself for years to come.”

Ashleigh Atwell is a student at Georgia State University and Public Relations co-chair of the Atlanta Association of Black Journalists Student Consortium.
Under the banner of iLead | iServe, CBCF has served as an information broker for almost 40 years for African Americans and communities of color. Through its mission of developing leaders, informing policy and educating the public, the Foundation has shown the value, impact and positive influence of leadership and service to national and international audiences. Founded in 1976, CBCF envisions a world in which the black community is free of all disparities and able to contribute fully to advancing the common good. CBCF is a nonpartisan, nonprofit organization and is led by its Board Chairman Rep. Donald M. Payne of New Jersey and its President Elsie L. Scott, Ph.D.

To learn more about the Congressional Black Caucus Foundation, please visit our web site at www.cbcfinc.org

Please join us for our 42nd Annual Legislative Conference

September 19-22, 2012
Washington, DC
Digital Diva Sets New Direction for NABJ Convention

An interview with Benet Wilson

By RACHEL HUGGINS

Benet Wilson joined NABJ five years ago and today she carries the load of a life-long member. The self-proclaimed “aviation queen” has brought her digital expertise on board as program chair of the 2012 convention in New Orleans, June 20-24. She is also chairwoman of the Digital Journalism Task Force.

In addition to NABJ, Wilson is the director of media relations for the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association and juggles duties as a freelance aviation journalist and blogger.

NABJ: What’s at the top of your agenda as program chair?
BENET: I thought Dr. Syb did a fantastic job taking our workshops to the next level last year. People did mention that they missed some of the more traditional workshops, so this year we’ve created sessions based on three tracks: “Perfecting Your Craft” will address the basics of journalism and ways to beef up writing skills. “Tech and Tools” will teach attendees how to be more effective with social media tools. “Innovation Station” will help those who want to become more entrepreneurial in their newsrooms. We want people to have a clear idea of what to expect in New Orleans.

NABJ: Next year’s convention theme is ‘New platforms. New direction. New Orleans.’ Are we going in a new direction digitally?
BENET: Yes, NABJ wants to be on the forefront of helping members reach new platforms with digital tools. The convention app that NABJ member Michelle Johnson developed last year will also be back and even better.

NABJ: How will you help “old-school print reporters” bridge the digital divide in an ever-evolving industry?
BENET: There’s going to be something for everyone and the workshops will introduce cool new storytelling tools that help enhance the stories we write. [NABJ] founder DeWayne Wickham, an “old-school journalist” who crossed the digital divide says it best: “You’re either going to adapt and do this, or retire.”

NABJ: NABJ has not been to New Orleans since 1983. How is your committee preparing for the organization’s return?
BENET: We’ve revitalized the New Orleans chapter, which was devastated after Hurricane Katrina. I have Nicondra Norwood, President of NOABJ, on the programming committee this year and she’s been resourceful in planning events and activities members can enjoy in the city. Our return was initially slated for 2014, but the timing now is perfect because it will bring in a lot of dollars that the county can definitely use since Katrina.

NABJ: With the national presidential election approaching, can we expect to see both party candidates stop by?
BENET: Since it’s election season, you never know who might show up. We’ve gotten some really good proposals on political-based workshops that encompass skills people can also use on other beats.

NABJ: Next year’s convention will be earlier than usual. Has it presented any challenges? Do members feel the need to choose between attending NABJ or UNITY’s convention?
BENET: The deadlines are tighter, but we’re rolling right along. More than 180 proposals were submitted, which is well in line with last year’s performance. There’s a big enough gap that people can decide what’s most important and I think our members will still support our convention --whether you’re for or against the Board’s decision to withdraw from UNITY. Personally, I don’t see a lot of people in the industry who look like me, so it’s energizing to take what I’ve learned from NABJ workshops back to my newsroom.

NABJ: Final thoughts?
BENET: Come to New Orleans. Come see us! You will get food for your stomach and food for your mind.

Rachel Huggins is a Washington-based writer and assistant online editor for USA TODAY.
How many American jobs does the oil and natural gas industry support?

a. 100,000
b. 9.2 million ✔
c. 5 million
d. 1 million

Source: PriceWaterhouseCoopers, “Economic Impacts of the Oil and Natural Gas Industry”

Join the discussion about how energy fuels American jobs at exxonmobil.com/blog
Perhaps it is the historic nature of President Barack Obama's candidacy and subsequent election, or perhaps it is the fact that his embrace of social media and Web 2.0 platforms, even as a candidate, naturally thrust him more in the spotlight than his contemporaries.

Whatever the reason, President Obama has received a tremendous amount of press coverage, in comparison with other presidential candidates, dating back to the 2008 election that landed him in the White House. Leading up to the 2008 election, Obama received more than twice the coverage of Republican frontrunner John McCain. During that campaign, the coverage of Obama was largely neutral-to-positive (35 percent neutral/mixed, and 36 percent strictly positive), with scattered negative reports (29 percent of all stories about Obama), including those suggesting he was a Muslim terrorist and/or not an American citizen.

An October 2008 report by the Pew Research Center found that leading up to the election, "the tone switched with the changing direction of the polls. The most positive stories about [Obama] were those that were most political-the ones focused on polling, the electoral map, and tactics."

This finding has held true as we entered the 2012 election season, the tone in coverage has made a noticeable shift away from the positive. This is not to suggest that there is significantly more negative coverage - an October 2011 Pew Research Center report found that 34 percent of coverage about Obama is negative, just five points higher than in the months preceding his election - however, coverage has shifted a lot more to neutral/mixed as the economy continues reeling and various opinion polls show Obama as less popular than he was initially. In 23 weeks of the study, positive coverage made up between only 8 and 10 percent of all reports about the president, and 57 percent of mainstream media reports were neutral.

Obama is, without doubt, gregarious. When he appears in person at public events, even insignificant ones such as the pardoning of the Thanksgiving turkey, he wins over the public and members of the press by coming across as funny and likable. In his ability to relate well to members of the press and present himself as amicable and accessible, the president scores extremely high: 9 out of 10.

In the "give 'em something to talk about" category, Obama and his family, who often venture beyond the confines of 1600 Pennsylvania Ave., again rank high: 9 out of 10. Whether it is Michelle Obama’s wardrobe choice while shopping at Target, fashion sense, fitness regimen and ability to appear youthful and "hip" reflect the nation’s current culture which tends to idolize all things young and cool. The entire Obama family, with its annual treks to Obama’s home state of Hawaii or summer sojourns at Martha’s Vineyard, comes across as young and cool.

Try as he might, Obama cannot get the media to "blame Republicans" for the slow economic recovery. News of bin Laden’s capture was overshadowed by the impact it may have on Obama’s re-election campaign, and there has been little media focus on the end of the Iraq war.

In terms of ability to control the message and steer conversations in the media, Obama does not perform well; he scores a 6 out of 10 in his ability to focus the media on what he wants to discuss overall, and 4 out of 10 recently. Try as he might, Obama cannot get the media to "blame Republicans" for the slow economic recovery. News of bin Laden’s capture was overshadowed by the impact it may have on Obama’s re-election campaign, and there has been little media focus on the end of the Iraq war. Also, the president’s jobs message is lost in the still-high unemployment rate.

Finally, an end-of-the-year Gallup Poll showing Americans who approve of Obama’s job performance increased over those who disapproved of him by a 47 percent to 45 percent margin.

The increased approval rating represented a “notable uptick” since October 2011, Gallup reported. Yet, such news failed to receive significant coverage given other December 2011 news that included the death of North Korea’s leader, a surge of voter interest for Republican presidential candidate Ron Paul and a proliferation of holiday stories about cooking, eating, shopping and re-gifting.
Barack Hussein Obama, the 44th U.S. president and first African-American commander in chief, has endured an unapologetically hostile Republican-majority Congress ["You lie!" bellowed South Carolina representative Joe Wilson during Obama’s 2009 speech to a joint session of Congress], confronted feckless Wall Street investment bankers who wrecked much of the U.S. economy yet cried foul at any suggestion of government regulation, and ordered the killing of public enemy No. 1, Osama bin Laden.

After a challenging three of four years on the job, will voters renew Obama’s contract and re-elect him in November? A handful of political journalists and political scientists interviewed in December took differing paths to make these universal predictions: Obama at this writing is vulnerable because of the fragile economy that includes nearly 9 percent unemployment, yet his chances for re-election are also promising because the Republican opposition appears dysfunctional and weak.

The experts also agreed that predicting an election about one year out is a perilous gamble. Nevertheless they offered many clear-eyed historical clues. Let’s examine their insights.

ALL ABOUT THE ECONOMY

USA Today columnist DeWayne Wickham said this of Obama’s re-election chances: "He’s vulnerable because of the state of the economy, just as George W. Bush was when Obama ran against his economic policies in 2008, which hurt [GOP candidate] John McCain. That's the similarity between 2008 and 2012."

Alphonso Jackson, former secretary of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development during the George W. Bush administration, said because of the struggling economy, "I’m convinced that Obama’s team has told him that right now he’s losing. “A year out, a generic Republican is beating him by 10 points,” Jackson continued. “When you put a name on a candidate, they’re tied with Obama. That’s not a good sign.”

Jackson currently is a distinguished professor at Hampton University, and since fall 2008, has directed HU's Center for Public Policy and Leadership.

“Scientifically, if [Obama’s] tied with [Mitt] Romney or [Newt] Gingrich, he’s behind 5 points because he’s lost the independent voters. Independents are totally not for him because of the economy.”

Quentin Kidd, a political science professor at Christopher Newport University and director of the Wason Center for Public Policy, said the issues and challenges Obama faces are the economy, health care law challenges, and taxes and the wealthy. His odds of re-election are 50-50 or better.”

Kidd added that predicting the outcome was perilous for this reason: “Go back to 1991. President George H.W. Bush had the highest approval rating in history, and he lost it to an unknown governor from Arkansas. A year is a lifetime in politics.”

GOP FIELD HELPS INCUMBENT

While the weak economy could lead disappointed voters to deny Obama a second term, a motley crew of Republican challengers could boost the incumbent’s re-election chances this fall. “You can’t win a horse race without a horse,” said Wickham, an NABJ founder and former president. “The Republicans don’t have a horse; they have pack mules and they are all damaged.”

Romney, the former Massachusetts governor and business executive, appears formidable, but he is loathed by conservatives. Newt Gingrich of Georgia has three drama-filled marriages to explain, plus policy ideas that run counter to GOP orthodoxy. Ron Paul is consistent and resolute, but appears to be too extreme to be elected [he wants all foreign aid cut, a position so extreme the Texas Congressman was not invited to a December candidates forum hosted by Jewish Republicans since his recommended cuts include Israel]. During a fall 2011 televised debate, Rick Perry could not remember the U.S. Cabinet agencies he vows to abolish.

Meanwhile, Herman Cain suspended his candidacy on Dec. 3 after an Atlanta woman said she had a longitudinal sexual relationship with the former pizza chain executive who has been married for four decades. When Cain, the lone black GOP candidate, surged to the top of the seven-member Republican field last fall, Mary Curtis, a Charlotte-based journalist and political commentator, noted Cain’s remark: “Black people who don’t give the GOP a chance are on the [Democrats’] plantation.”

“So,” Curtis wondered, “You insult voters [in order to get their support]?” WVON-AM Chicago talk show host Salim Muwakkil believes Obama will win a second term as president. “Obama’s re-election chances are strong if his opponent is someone like Gingrich, or another partisan who has less appeal to so-called centrists, who pundits say are the target audience. Romney is not as strongly identified as a rabid partisan. Obama’s chances for re-election would be worse against him. At this point, Obama’s chances are relatively good.” Muwakkil is also the longtime senior editor of In These Times, a left-leaning political journal.

INTEREST GROUPS ARE WILD CARDS

Obama will win or lose his re-election bid based on the performance - or lack thereof - of several key voting blocs, political journalists and political scientists interviewed for this article agreed.

Regarding Black America, Curtis said “Polls show the economy hit them hard, but they are more optimistic than many people who are doing better. They’re realistic about what a president can and cannot do and they see there is not a lot of cooperation in Congress, and it appears to be personal, not political. There is resentment that Obama is being disrespected.

“Many African-Americans are frustrated but will not sit home; they believe the president was not given a chance,” Curtis continued. “They also see things that he has done, i.e. foreign policy successes [toppling Libya’s Moammar Gadhafi with little-to-no-loss of American lives, and the killing of Osama bin Laden].”

“As for the struggling economy, voting blocs will consider the alternatives,” she adds. “Hispanic voters wanted more from Obama, but they hear the harsh rhetoric from Republicans about immigration.”

In Virginia, Obama in 2008 captured white, suburban, well-educated college grads that were middle class and needed their jobs, said Kidd of CNU. “These are the people who swung against the president in 2010 [and after midterm elections handed Congressional Republicans a House majority]. They are also the people who give Congress 9-percent approval ratings.

“Obama’s real challenge in Virginia is winning moderate middle-class voters and young voters,” Kidd continued. “African-Americans won’t abandon him, but they may not show up in the same numbers as 2008.”

Muwakkil said “Obama has estranged components of his original coalition. Some young voters are less enthusiastic. African-Americans are less enthusiastic. Some Latinos are less enthusiastic. There has been some erosion.

“Yet recent elections indicate some buyer’s remorse.” Muwakkil referenced the November elections, where in Ohio, voters rejected the GOP governor’s plan to end collective bargaining for public union workers, and in Wisconsin, voters attempted to recall Republican Gov. Scott Walker. After the 2010 midterm Congressional elections, said Muwakkil, “the Republicans may have overreached. There’s some movement back to the president.”

Jackson of HU said he was not worried about the constantly shifting GOP field. “Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama did not resolve things until June 2008 [a month before the Democratic National Convention]. They were cutting each other up. It just shows how fluid this [presidential campaign] is.”

Wayne Dawkins is an assistant professor at Hampton University Scripps Howard School of Journalism and Communications. The recipient of the 2011 E.L. Hamm Teaching Excellence Award, Dawkins is author of “City Son,” a biography about Andrew Cooper, NABJ’s 1987 Journalist of the Year.
Health Policy and Health Inequities

Join us as we discuss the current policies and practices affecting the African American community!

Network with hundreds of media professionals!

SAVE THE DATE!
March 29-31, 2012
Barbara Jordan Conference Center
Kaiser Family Foundation
1330 G Street, NW
Washington, DC 20005

A CONFERENCE THAT FOCUSES EXCLUSIVELY OF HEALTH DISPARITIES IN COMMUNITIES OF COLOR!

Register TODAY at www.nabj.org

For more information call 301-405-0248
NABJ Members on the Move:

TENISHA BELL
Moves to Executive Producer of “CNN Newsroom”

NABJ offers its sincerest congratulations to NABJ member Tenisha Bell on her appointment as the Executive Producer of “CNN Newsroom with Suzanne Malveaux.”

Bell who has been with CNN for six and a half years currently oversees CNN’s weekend morning shows, 6a – 12p. In that time she has distinguished herself by leading the show teams for anchors T.J. Holmes, Betty Nguyen, Rick Sanchez, Tony Harris, Fredricka Whitfield, Carol Lin and several others. Prior to her time spent in network news she produced in various local markets including Washington, DC, Cincinnati, Ohio, and Chattanooga, Tennessee.

Away from the newsroom she is an active leader within NABJ serving as the president of one of the association’s leading chapters, the Atlanta Association of Black Journalists.

Bell is also married to fellow NABJ member WGCL CBS Atlanta reporter Craig Bell and the couple has an adorable young son.

NABJ wishes Bell much success on her new role.

RUSS MITCHELL
Returns to Local TV News

NABJ congratulates member Russ Mitchell’s return to local news in Cleveland.

After nearly 20 years at CBS News as weekend anchor of “CBS Evening News” and “The Early Show,” Mitchell is going to Gannett station WKYC (NBC affiliate) and will be managing editor and lead anchor at 6 and 11 weeknights. Mitchell began his new role on Jan. 16.

Mitchell worked in local television for 10 years in his hometown of St. Louis, Dallas and Kansas City before going to CBS.

“Russ is good friend to NABJ and we couldn’t be happier for him on his new role,” said NABJ Vice President of Broadcast, Bob Butler. “We wish him well on this newest career endeavor.”

KRISTEN WELKER
Appointed as NBC News White House Correspondent

NABJ congratulates member Kristen Welker for her appointment as NBC News White House Correspondent.

Welker has been filling in on the beat since June, traveling domestically and internationally with President Obama and the First Lady. Early this week NBC News announced that Welker will join Chuck Todd and Mike Viqueira in covering the White House and will play an integral role in NBC’s Election 2012 reporting.

Welker joined NBC News in August 2010 as part of the network’s Los Angeles bureau. She began covering the White House earlier this year when Savannah Guthrie left her position in D.C. for a new role at the Today Show.

NABJ also salutes Perry Bacon Jr, who was named Political Editor at theGrio.com.

TRACY BROWN and SANDRA STEVENSON
Selected for 2012 New York Times Leadership Academy

NABJ members Tracy Brown of Newsday (pictured far right) and Sandra Stevenson of The New York Times (pictured second from the left) have been selected for the New York Times Leadership Academy. They are featured here with other academy participants, National Association of Hispanic Journalists (NAHJ) members Rodrigo Cervantes of Atlanta and Teresa Frontado of Miami.

The Leadership Academy is a unique training and development program for print and Web journalists who are, or aspire to become, newsroom managers. Beginning or mid-career managers will be guided through the issues and challenges of newsroom leadership and will gain skills necessary to lead in a rapidly-changing media world.

The four journalists selected to attend the Academy will receive all-expense-paid leadership training at The Times during the fall and at Harvard University through the Maynard Institute Media Academy in January and March (each session at Harvard is a week-long). The group will come together one last time at the summer NABJ convention to share their experience with the group.

T.J. HOLMES
Moves to BET

NABJ congratulates member T.J. Holmes on his decision to move to BET.

BET has announced a multi-platform deal with Holmes which includes a newly developed show hosted by the veteran journalist on BET, as well as content on BET.com in which Holmes will report on important and interesting stories for BET’s growing audience.

Holmes currently anchors CNN Saturday & Sunday Morning, the weekend edition of CNN Newsroom. He joined the network in October of 2006.

Since joining CNN, Holmes has anchored numerous major breaking news stories, including the network’s coverage of the tornadoes that destroyed Joplin, MO, the Gulf oil spill in 2010, terrorist attacks in Mumbai, India and the conflict between Russia and the former Soviet Republic of Georgia in 2008; the Virginia Tech shooting from location in Blacksburg, Virginia and the terrorist attacks at the Glasgow Airport in Scotland in 2007; and Saddam Hussein’s execution in 2006.

— Compiled by Aprill O. Turner
Success stories begin with the printed word

The information available in news media has always been a building block of financial success, and that kind of up-to-date knowledge has never been more important than it is today. Wells Fargo has a 150-year history of delivering the information our customers need to succeed financially, and we look forward to helping even more African American communities achieve their financial goals.

We are proud to recognize the National Association of Black Journalists.
2012 NABJ HALL OF FAME INDUCTION

JANUARY 26, 2012 NEWSEUM, WASHINGTON D.C.

Photos by: Bill Hart, Ken Wright and Darryle Carter
Gwen Ifill

By NICOLE FERGUSON CARR

Gwen Ifill’s Twitter timeline is indicative of her primary interest.

Politics.

On Dec. 16, 2011, Ifill retweeted a Gallup article citing seven in 10 Americans do not look forward to the antics and hoopla sure to pepper the 2012 presidential elections.

Ifill laughs when the retweet is called to her attention, and notes that she among that 30-percent minority.

For the PBS “Washington Week” moderator and managing editor, this year’s presidential election is a synonym for “showtime.”

“I think it gives us a chance to take stock of Americans,” Ifill said of the upcoming election. “I’m almost not as interested in what the candidates are saying. I’m more curious about how Americans are responding.”

Many Americans have responded to Ifill with a level of respect that she naturally commands in her reporting, whether it is from a correspondents’ gallery or the PBS studios in northern Virginia.

Ifill has always wanted to be a journalist.

“I’m so blessed to do what I do.”

Ifill, 56, a Simmons College graduate, began her journalism career at the Boston Herald-American. The New York native made several stops in the print industry at the Washington Post and New York Times before transitioning into television as a political correspondent for NBC. In 1999, she joined PBS and “Washington Week,” the longest-running primetime news and public affairs program on television. On the PBS website, the show is billed as “Washington Week with Gwen Ifill and National Journal.”

In a career that’s spanned three decades, from the Washington Post to her current role at PBS, the journalist and best-selling author is no holds barred. Ifill challenges politicians with confidence, moderates debates with ease and stands up to bullies who have insulted her intelligence because of her skin color.

In 2007, Ifill famously took on conservative talk radio host Don Imus for his reference to the Rutgers University women’s basketball team as “nappy headed hos.” When penning a thoughtful New York Times column condemning the comments, perhaps Ifill thought of a former New York newspaper Melba Tulliver. Tulliver, renowned for her large Afro hairstyle, inspired Ifill while growing up. Tulliver looked like Ifill.

“If I know what’s like to be the little black girl (with few similar role models),” said Ifill. “Often it’s not the smart, black girl made (who is) made out to be a role model.”

“I think there’s a way to be journalists, and analysts without being pundits.”

Critics challenged philosophy that in 2008, shortly before Ifill’s best-seller, “The Breakthrough: Politics in the Age of Obama,” hit shelves. Some lashed out, assuming the black author’s work would be an automatic endorsement of the then-Illinois senator. Ifill’s ability to fairly moderate an upcoming vice presidential debate was also challenged.

The debate came and went. Ifill received praise for her performance from the left and right.

“I proved them wrong,” she recalled. “The problem with the web is the criticism lives, but silence doesn’t.”

“Washington Week” won a George Foster Peabody Award for coverage of the 2008 presidential election and its special series of road shows in eight cities across the country.

Ifill said she is “incredibly, deeply honored” to be inducted into the National Association of Black Journalists’ Hall of Fame. The 35-year NABJ member credits the organization for much of her professional success, and her personal sanity, calling it a “place of refuge.”

As for what’s ahead, well, there’s no telling.

“I never know. I love what I do now. I love what I get to do,” said Ifill. “I don’t think it’s particularly important to know as long as you’re putting one foot in front of the other.”

Nicole Ferguson is a morning reporter and anchor at Fox 8 WOHP in Greensboro, N.C.

Johnathan Rodgers

By NISA MUHAMMAD

Johnathan Rodgers is a man three times retired, first from CBS where he worked for 20 years in several roles, including news director for two news stations in Chicago and Los Angeles. He later served as general manager of CBS’s Chicago station, before becoming president of CBS’s urban stations.

“It was important to me as an individual and as an African-American male to get into a position where I could help protect, if not control, the images of the African American community,” Rodgers once told AfroCentric News. Generally, local television news is seen by African Americans and other people. The image blacks saw, especially in the 70’s and 80’s, were African Americans portrayed with “their coats over their heads being run through a police line.”

Rodgers didn’t agree with such representation, calling it “wrong and unfair.”

Rather than ignore such coverage, he used his authority to hire people who, using fairness as a yardstick, would “not color” the news.

This I found rewarding,” he continued in the AfroCentric interview. “Under me, our anchor teams were clearly the role model for multi-cultural talent. The general managers of those stations reported to me, and I in turn reported to Howard Stringer, the president of CBS.”

After only three months in retirement, Rodgers was lured back to television as president of the Discovery Networks in 1996. At that time, the network only owned the Discovery Channel and the Learning Channel valued at $8 billion.

When Rodgers retired again, some seven years later, the network had grown to 14 channels and was valued at $18 billion.

But again retirement was short lived. In 2004 Rodgers became president and chief executive officer of TV One. The award-winning cable network, which serves nearly 53 million adults, attributes much of its growth and success to Rodgers.

“Johnathan Rodgers is truly one of the most remarkable individuals in media today,” said Roland Martin, host and managing editor of “Washington Watch with Roland Martin” on TV One. “He made a successful transition from journalist (he was the first Black sportswriter at Sports Illustrated) to one of the most successful cable operators of his generation.

“But what makes Johnathan so special is that he is excellent at recognizing talent and letting his people do what they do best,” Martin continued. “For me personally, he is one of my strongest allies and someone who I count on at all times for guidance and advice. I am thankful for his friendship and confidence, and am no doubt pleased that NABJ is recognizing him as one of the best of the best.”

Nisa Muhammad is a freelance journalist.
By RAVEN L. HILL

Even though Ruth Allen Ollison left journalism almost 20 years ago, she hasn’t been able to shake off the calling.

In 1994, she decided to trade in her mic for the ministry after realizing that she couldn’t address social ills from afar. At the time, she was an executive news producer for the CBS affiliate in Houston.

“I saw poverty, drugs, abuse, addiction,” Ollison said. “I saw people who were passing up the opportunity to be educated. I saw a lot of young kids without direction.”

She left the newsroom and bought a crack house on one of the roughest blocks in the notorious Third Ward. It would eventually house Beulah Land Community Church, which she started. As the name suggests, her ministry focuses on sharing the “good news” with the people who live in the neighborhoods surrounding the church.

Today, Ollison expresses appreciation for her journalistic training, saying it helps her to help others.

“I have to ask a lot of questions. ‘Who, what, when, where and why’ are the most important questions in the ministry, and the big one is ‘How?’”

A past president of the Dallas-Fort Worth Association of Black Communicators, Ollison’s media career took her to Dallas, San Antonio and Washington, D.C. She views her impending induction with a mixture of pride, awe and disbelief.

“All is almost 20 years ago, she hasn’t been able to shake off the calling. ‘I felt that way when I was in the business,’ she says. ‘I feel specifically that way in the ministry.’

Raven L. Hill is a freelance writer whose work has appeared in daily newspapers, magazines and other publications, including EBONY and The Root.com.

By XAVIER HIGGS

Pat Harvey is more than a personality. She is the most identifiable face on television in Los Angeles. This is an unusual distinction in a market where the entertainers and media personalities are as relevant as palm trees.

Any given week night on KCBS TV at 5 and 11 p.m., Harvey is the constant professional etched into the television newscast in the nation’s second market. In a trending movement, more and more, news organizations are looking to their most prominent women correspondents, who are also highly regarded by viewers, to play the leading role in their primetime newscast.

For more than 35 years Harvey has been an invited guest to millions of Southern California television viewers’ homes.

As the longest tenured woman in prime time news, she has earned the respect of viewers because of on-air performance, communication skills, writing skills, and, most importantly journalistic credentials. Because of her longevity, Harvey has become a custodian of respectable journalism on television.

“Harvey has distinguished herself in Los Angeles as an impeccable journalist with the highest credentials and unquestionable integrity,” says Lois Pitter-Bruce, a media relations manager for Southern California Edison. As a former Harvey co-worker, Pitter-Bruce also notes Harvey’s strong work ethic and habit of always being prepared.

As one of the most prominent news anchors in Los Angeles, Harvey is the epitome of success for women in television news. She long ago

Pat Harvey

Winter 2012 | nabj.org | National Association of Black Journalists | 23
By APRILL O.TURNER

WABE 90.1FM News Director, Michael Fields has been a diversity champion which has resulted in excellent WABE news coverage and a more accurate reflection of the diverse communities that Public Broadcasting Atlanta serves.

The Ida B. Wells Award is named in honor of the distinguished journalist, fearless reporter and wife of one of America's earliest black publishers. Wells was “editor and proprietor” of the Memphis Free Speech and Headlight. She told her male co-founders she would not help launch the newspaper unless she was made “equal to them.” In the late 19th century, Wells won acclaim on two continents for her fearless crusade against lynching.

“I am greatly humbled to even be mentioned in the same breath with Ida B. Wells, who was one of America’s most courageous journalists, battling the double handicaps of both race and gender to fight the evils of lynching,” said Fields.

Since the WABE newsroom first came under the leadership of Fields in 2006, telling truths about diverse and underserved populations has resulted in the station becoming a highly regarded and award-winning news outlet.

For the last two years, the Atlanta Press Club has selected WABE reporters as the winners of its Radio Journalist of the Year award. Every current WABE reporter has contributed to NPR with a newscast report or longer feature piece, or been tapped as a guest on a NPR program.

Fields encourages reporters to take an in-depth approach to stories, rather than just the traditional “who, what, when, and where.”

One example was the station’s ongoing coverage of Georgia’s immigration reform. WABE’s reporters traveled to South Georgia and spent several days with immigrant workers. That story was subsequently featured on the national public radio program, The World.

Fields also led WABE newsroom’s aggressive and continuing coverage of the test cheating scandal in the Atlanta Public Schools, which have a majority minority student population. They are the people most affected by the scandal, something which Fields has always focused on at WABE’s.

The racial diversity of WABE’s Newsroom, itself made Fields a strong candidate for NABJ’s 2011 Ida B. Wells Award. Metro Atlanta is known nationwide for its large concentration of people of color. As an NABJ member himself, Fields understands the importance of assembling a skilled, diverse workforce. Since 2006, Fields has worked to hire reporters who not only reflect the region’s minority population, but have the skills required to produce quality, in-depth reports about the region. Five of WABE’s 10-person newsroom are people of color and 40 percent are women.

NABJ is proud to honor Fields with the 2012 Ida B. Wells Award.

Aprill O. Turner is NABJ’s Communication Consultant and Public Relations Professor at Morgan State University.

“...I am greatly humbled to even be mentioned in the same breath with Ida B. Wells...”
Wallace Terry chronicled Civil Rights-Era Journalists

By WAYNE DAWKINS

Wallace Terry was a former Washington Post reporter, Time magazine war correspondent, Howard University journalism professor and author of "Bloods," the seminal oral history about black soldiers' experiences in Vietnam.

Yet, the distinguished journalist had been deceased for four years when Erv Dyer, a member of NABJ's Pittsburgh chapter, learned about his legacy during a 2007 Veteran's Day program in Pittsburgh.

"Wow, I didn't know about the man," said Dyer, a former Pittsburgh Post-Gazette journalist. "We (as journalists) should know about him."

Dyer said he and colleagues at the NABJ affiliate Pittsburgh Black Media Workers began nominating Terry for induction into the NABJ Hall of Fame in 2007.

After four years of attempts, Terry [1938-2003] was accepted posthumously. He will be recognized at the Jan. 26 ceremony in Washington.

Janice Terry, who talked about her late husband's work during the 2007 Veteran's Day program in Pittsburgh, said he was a "smart, exciting and well-read" man.

She recalls their meeting and subsequent marriage as if it were yesterday.

"I was an elementary school teacher," she said. "I met Wally in 1960 at a party at my best friend's house. Wally walked up to me and told me his name."

"I said, 'Did you just write a story that was on the front page of the Washington Post?' 'He was stunned, and said, 'Nobody ever reads my bylines. Will you marry me?'"

She did in 1962.

A year later Terry left the Post for Time magazine to work as a Washington correspondent. In 1967 he was promoted to deputy bureau chief and dispatched to Vietnam. There, Terry participated in the daring rescue of several journalists' bodies during an enemy attack.

Janice Terry visited her husband 18 times during his overseas combat tour, which led an interviewer to ask incredulously, "What were you doing, taking him lunch?"

She answered, "I wanted to be with him."

After Time, Wallace Terry taught at Howard, wrote "Bloods" in 1984 and frequently appeared as a contributing editor with Parade, the lead-

"Wallace's wife, Janice Terry, picked up the writers research in 2007."

Terry was stationed in Vietnam for two years. He interviewed hundreds of black military personnel, both enlisted ranks and officers. Photo provided

Wallace Terry made a major contribution in reporting on the realities of his time. Fabams.com

Dawkins is an assistant professor at Hampton University Scripps Howard School of Journalism and Communications. He is the 2011 E.L. Hamm teaching excellence award winner. "City Son" is Dawkins' forthcoming biography of 1987 NABJ Journalist of the year Andrew W. Cooper.
NABJ Chapters Work to Improve Themselves and Communities

By WILLIAM J. FORD

If you ask a member of the National Association of Black Journalists to list one of the 37-year-old organization's survival strategies, a likely answer will be its affiliate chapters. According to NABJ's website, there are approximately 75 affiliate and university-affiliate chapters.

Further proof was provided last month when NABJ provided grants - up to $500 each - to nine professional and student chapters to use toward programs, increase membership and build relationships in local communities.

"Chapters are the backbone of NABJ," said NABJ President Gregory Lee Jr., when the grants were announced. "Without strong chapters, we cannot have a strong national organization. We applaud these nine chapters for their hard work in continuing to make NABJ a great organization. We wish them well with their efforts to help their memberships as well as their local community."

Here's a snapshot of some 2011 NABJ chapter activities, such as providing scholarships for high school and college students and hosting seminars with local leaders about how to contact the media for civic and community events.

BOSTON ASSOCIATION OF BLACK JOURNALISTS

Established: Reformed January 2011
Membership: 22

After being defunct for several years, the BABJ decided it was time to once again secure a strong foundation in Boston. Chapter leaders organized a meeting last summer to prepare members for the national convention in Philadelphia. Last month, the group organized a Christmas gathering to attract new members. The group's efforts paid off when BABJ issued BABJ a grant to help the chapter launch a speakers' series and a journalism workshop for high school and college students. The goal: increase and retain membership and become more visible in the city. "We feel there is great potential and purpose in the Boston Association of Black Journalists and we can't wait to get started with making a difference in the community," said Gary Washburn, chapter president.

CHARLOTTE AREA ASSOCIATION OF BLACK JOURNALISTS

Established: 2006
Membership: 30 on roster; 15 active

Website: www.caabj.com

Charlotte members began 2011 by taking a page out of the national organization's playbook geared toward a healthier NABJ. Getting and staying fit by eating right and learning some helpful aerobics tips were among the chapter's beginning of the year activities. And, because certain wines supposedly are good for the heart, the chapter hosted a wine-tasting fundraiser last September, with proceeds to benefit its scholarship fund. CAABJ also co-hosted a forum for Charlotte-Mecklenburg school board candidates in October. CAABJ uses every event as a recruiting tool for new members. It expects to see an increase in membership when it hosts a newsroom diversity seminar and prepares for the Democratic National Convention that will take place in what's known as the "Queen City," in September.

DALLAS-FORT WORTH ASSOCIATION OF BLACK JOURNALISTS

Established: 1981
Membership: 300 on roster; 50 active
Website: www.dfwabj.org

This thriving chapter utilized a barter system to host a recent scholarship program. In exchange for the Dallas-Fort Worth's chapters' free use of a facility, facility owners received free publicity on the chapter's website. During the annual scholarship program last December, the chapter celebrated its 30th anniversary that featured CNN's Soledad O'Brien. More important, $4,500 in scholarships was awarded to deserving students. The chapter also awarded two scholarships and two internships through its eight-week Urban Journalism Workshop. Cheryl Smith, Dallas-Fort Worth chapter president, said future programs include teaching students and members how to create their own websites and how to utilize social media. The chapter also plans to continue a tradition of hosting a mixer with the Dallas-Fort Worth area's Hispanic journalists.

"The only way NABJ is going to continue to be strong is through our chapters," Smith said. "That allows our national organization to become even more successful."

SAN DIEGO ASSOCIATION OF BLACK JOURNALISTS

Established: 2000
Membership: 15
Website: www.sdabj.org

In April 2011, SDABJ awarded nearly $4,500 in scholarships for high school and college students. An additional scholarship was bestowed to a working adult who shot a documentary, "Everyday People in Black America: Positive Black Images." That allowed her to receive a free college education worth $40,000 at National University's Journalism and New Media program. The school is a private, non-profit organization based in La Jolla, Calif. The chapter highlighted its "Pro for a Day" workshop in October on the website, which allows high school and college students to work as media professionals writing and broadcasting stories. In 2012, the chapter wants to increase its presence in the community by launching a speaker's bureau and working more with local high schools.
WASHINGTON ASSOCIATION OF BLACK JOURNALISTS

Established: 1975
Membership: 350 on roster; 30 active
Website: www.wabjdc.org

One of the most transient regions in the country, the D.C. chapter was extremely busy in 2011 with its annual Urban Journalism Workshop, broadcasting the first live NABJ candidates forum in June, and teaching Howard University students how to effectively and efficiently network. The chapter will continue working into 2012 by assisting the national office in presenting the 2012 NABJ Hall of Fame Induction ceremony. A “professionals” mixer is underway for the new year that will allow chapter members to interact with Washington-area business class professionals. “D.C. is an exciting but especially challenging city, for a chapter - as the nation’s capital it attracts top journalists, but with so much news, it’s also an extremely busy and transient market,” said Donna Walker, WABJ’s president. “That makes it more difficult to hold onto a large consistent base. At the same time, we have a very loyal and enthusiastic group of core supporters.”

William J. Ford is a freelance writer based in Upper Marlboro, Md.

Recipients of NABJ 2011 Fall Chapter Grants

Professional chapters:
- Boston Association of Black Journalists
- Columbus Association of Black Journalists
- Hampton Roads Black Media Professionals
- Jackson Association of Black Journalists
- Triad Association of Black Journalists

Student chapters:
- Carolina Association of Black Journalists
- Jackson State University Chapter of NABJ
- University of Louisville
- Winthrop University Association of Black Journalists
NABJ Founders & Lifetime Members

Founders
- Norma Adams-Wade
- Carole Bartel
- Edward Blackwell (Deceased)
- Paul Brock
- Reginald Bryant (Deceased)
- Maureen Bunyan
- Crispin Campbell
- Charlie Cobb
- Marilyn Darling
- Leon Dash
- Joe Davidson
- Allison J. Davis
- Paul Delaney
- William Dilday
- Sandra Rosen Dillard
- Joel Dreyfuss
- Sam Ford
- David Gibson
- Sandra Gilliam-Beale
- Bob Greenlee
- Martha Griffin
- Derwood Hall (Deceased)
- Bob Hayes
- Vernon Jarrett (Deceased)
- Mal Johnson (Deceased)
- Toni Jones
- H. Chuku Lee
- Claude Lewis
- Sandra Dawson Long
- Pluria Marshall
- Acel Moore
- Luix Overbea (Deceased)
- Les Payne
- Claudia Polley
- Alex Poinsett
- Richard Rambeau
- Max Robinson (Deceased)
- Chuck Stone
- W. Curtis Riddle
- Jeannye Thornton
- Francis Ward
- Charlotte Roy
- Vince Sanders
- John C. White
- DeWayne Wickham

Lifetime Members
- Norma Adams-Wade
- Mervin Aubespine
- Drew Berry
- Paul Brock
- Sheila Brooks
- Shannon Buggs
- Maureen Bunyan
- Bob Butler
- Corey Chavous
- Barbara Ciara
- Charles Cobb, Jr.
- Marilyn Darling
- Leon Dash, Jr.
- Joe Davidson
- Allison Davis
- Paul Delaney
- William Dilday, Jr.
- Sandra Dillard
- Joel Dreyfuss
- Sidmell Estes
- Arthur Fennell
- Renee Ferguson
- Albert Fitzpatrick
- Samuel Ford
- Tonju Francois
- Dorothy Gilliam
- Cheryl Hampton
- Patricia Harvey-Lombard
- Andrew Humphrey
- Gwen Ifill
- Monica Kaufman Pearson
- Gregory Lee, Jr.
- H. Chuku Lee
- Claude Lewis
- Yvonne Lewis-Harris
- Sandra Long Weaver
- Herbert Lowe, Jr.
- Marcus Mabry
- Deitra Madison
- Paula Madison
- Pluria Marshall
- Roland Martin
- Walter Middlebrook, Jr.
- Shannon Miller
- Bryan Monroe
- Acel Moore
- Pam Moore
- Soledad O’Brien
- Les Payne
- Michelle Phillips Fay
- Byron Pitts
- Alex Poinsett
- Claudia Polley
- Paul Pope
- Condance Pressley
- Bob Reid
- W. Curtis Riddle
- Johnathan Rodgers
- Royal Rodgers
- Charlotte Roy
- Lani Russell Lewter
- Vince Sanders
- Mara Schiavocampo
- Priya Scroggins
- Lealy Simmons
- Tracy Smith Prevost
- Sheila Solomon
- Sakina Spruell
- David Squires
- Chuck Stone
- Will Sutton
- Rene Syler
- Elinor Tatum
- Cathy Times
- David Ushery
- Francis Ward
- LT. Colonel Mary Ann Warren
- Dino White
- John White
- Lonnie White
- DeWayne Wickham
- Vanessa Williams
The National Association of Black Journalists welcomes you to join us from June 20 - 24 as we gather in New Orleans for the 37th Annual Convention and Career Fair! Thousands of journalists, media executives, public relations professionals, and students are expected to attend to network, participate in professional development sessions and celebrate excellence in journalism.

This year’s NABJ Convention and Career Fair is all about expanding into new territories, updating best practices and connecting with old friends while making new ones.

Journalists and media professionals attending our convention will acquire skills to collaborate within the digital environment - such as creating a blog, developing a mobile app and producing a data visualization project. As we return to New Orleans for our convention, attendees can expect to attain relevant skills to push them to execute their professional goals. The lineup of workshops is innovative, educational and entrepreneurial in nature that ties into our theme – NABJ12: New Platforms. New Directions. New Orleans.

NABJ will feature something for everyone this year. With over 50 sessions, panel discussions, workshops, professional development sessions, and learning labs you’ll be sure to gather the information needed to enhance and advance your career. Sessions will fall under one of three tracks: Perfecting Your Craft, Tech & Tools and Innovation Station. Perfecting Your Craft sessions stress mastery of reporting, writing, editing; Tech and Tools sessions highlight new and emerging technology; Innovation Station sessions emphasize innovation and entrepreneurship in the dissemination of news and information.

Session highlights:

Perfecting Your Craft
- Photojournalism: How To? Where To? And What’s Next?
- Talking Heads 101
- On the Business Beat

Tech & Tools
- The Intersection of PR and Technology
- The Mobile Revolution: How Smart Phones & Tablets are Changing the Way We do Business
- The Gamification of News

Innovation Station
- Doing More Work with Less Time and Less Money
- The Best Jobs in Media Today Are Digital
- Black News Entrepreneurs: Where Are They?
- New Media, Old Problems

Also, apply today for our full-day and half-day Learning Labs on June 20 including:
- WordPress Web Design
- Mobile Storytelling 101
- Career Transition: Change, Creativity and Resilience

Meet NABJ in New Orleans!

Previous NABJ Convention: Byron Pitts (CBS) with President Barack Obama. Photo provided.
Special Events

5K Walk/Run
SATURDAY–JUNE 23, 2012

Rise and shine for better health! Join NABJ as we continue our journey to a healthier community at our 7th Annual 5K Walk/Run. Enjoy the company of NABJ members and guests as we make strides to healthier living, all while taking in the invigorating culture and scenery of New Orleans neighborhoods.

National Golf Tournament
SATURDAY–JUNE 23, 2012

Come and enjoy the camaraderie of NABJ members, celebrities and guests. You will get to spend time socializing and connecting with other players and hopefully a hole in one! Tee time is 7:30 a.m.!

Gospel Brunch
SATURDAY–JUNE 23, 2012

An NABJ tradition, the Gospel Brunch is one of the convention highlights. More than 1,000 attendees culminate for this experience by feasting on a brunch buffet and enjoying entertainment from various recording artists. Past brunches have featured Donnie McClurkin, Albertina Walker, CeCe Winans, Vicki Winans, Take Six, Vanessa Bell Armstrong and Tramaine Hawkins.

New Orleans Attractions
NABJ wants to help you make the most of your stay in New Orleans!

• French Quarter Tours du Jour
• Basin St. Station: The Cultural Crossroad
• The world famous Bourbon Street
• Creole dining, Cajun and Seafood
• And much more!
Networking

Sports Task Force Scholarship Jam
FRIDAY–JUNE 22, 2012

The Annual Sports Task Force Scholarship Jam is a special fundraising event. Come out and enjoy music and dancing for a good cause. Proceeds benefit NABJ’s Larry Whiteside Scholarship Fund.

Salute to Excellence Awards Gala
SATURDAY–JUNE 23, 2012

Each year, NABJ bestows its special honors awards on journalism professionals, educators, students and organizations that have gone above and beyond to produce exceptional coverage of the Black community. Past honorees include Soledad O’Brien, Carole Simpson and Bernie Shaw.

2012 Journalist of the Year
Pierre Thomas
Senior Justice Correspondent for ABC News

2012 Lifetime Achievement Award
DeWayne Wickham
Columnist for USA Today and the Gannett News Service

2012 Legacy Award
Monica Pearson
WSB-TV Atlanta Anchor
We make it easier.

And you can quote us on that.

Business Wire helps journalists and Web content providers follow companies or groups, access their breaking news and get in touch with experts who can act as sources for stories or websites. The advanced technology in our Journalist Tools includes PressPass, which lets you download photos and multimedia, customize your news profiles and use our archive of stories and news releases. It’s an indispensable service that makes your job easier. And that’s good news. Call 888.381.9473, email media.relations@businesswire.com or visit BusinessWire.com.