

He walked through the door

By Isabella and Olivia Fishman

From a twin's perspective

For months now he's been packing for his deployment to the middle east; But before we know he'll be walking through the door. In the morning we said goodbye as he walked through the door and went off to the airport. And when he walked out the door it felt like a big wet thunderstorm rising above us. The feeling of him missing a chapter of our life is pain that will never go away. But all along we'll know that he's a hero and always will be. During this experience we stayed in touch by facetimeing him when we could, we would also write him emails from time to time. We had to help a lot with our brother and our mom. But just when he was about to come home covid hit and all our excitement shattered to the ground but luckily, he got to fly back to the U.S but had to be deployed longer in Virginia. But we could not take it anymore, we had to go see him. We drove and drove to Virginia and finally we could see him again. It was one of the happiest moments of our life. But sadly, he could not come back home with us. Lucky after a couple weeks he could finally come home and walk right back through the door. We were all SOOO excited. But that summer did not feel the same without him. A year past and he was still home. Soon enough we'll be walking through that door to go to camp. A couple weeks before we came home from camp he had to go to Korea, and he would be in Korea by the time we came home. so, he came down to camp to say goodbye. He was gone for a good couple weeks. We missed him but he will come back soon. So finally, he came home and walked right back through that door. He said that he would not go on any big trips for a while, and that was true.
