Dr. Kristina Baltutis

Dr. Kristina Baltutis is a small animal general practitioner in central North Carolina. After graduating from North Carolina State University College of Veterinary Medicine in 2017, she worked in general practice and emergency medicine for two years before starting a mobile practice focused on canine theriogenology. She also writes a weekly blog on canine reproduction topics. As a former high school teacher, Dr. Baltutis is passionate about education and continues to enjoy teaching in her current role. She is also passionate about conservation medicine and the use of assisted reproductive technology in the preservation of endangered species. Outside of veterinary medicine, Dr. Baltutis enjoys spending time with her border collie, golden retrievers, cats, chinchilla, and husband. She and her husband also own multiple entrepreneurial ventures, including a hat company and a bookstore.
