Open government laws ensure that citizens can access records created by the governments that serve them, preventing secrecy and corruption. However, many important exemptions exist under these laws to protect individual privacy, national security, law enforcement, and the ability of executive officials to deliberate and make informed decisions, among many other concerns. How do state and federal laws balance interests like these against the public's right to know? And how might these laws be improved to better accomplish the promise of open government, while avoiding its perils? Earn 1.5 hours general MCLE credit. Presented by: Kelly Aviles, Prof. Aaron Caplan, L.A. County Inspector General Max Huntsman, Dan Laidman. For more information please visit lawdays.lalawlibrary.org.
